NATIVE VICTIMS OF THE FAMINE IN INDIA.

urgent need before the attention of the members. A very small sum from each member would make up a contribution which would save some poor starving creatures from perishing. Among the organizations who have recently proved in this way that they have imbibed the spirit of the Master, are: The Christian Endeavor Societies of Centre Lebanon, Me.; Litchfield, Neb., and Manston, Wis.; the Capital Foreign Missionary Band of Des Moines, Ia.; the Ladies' Missionary Society of the Reformed Church of Orrville, O.; the King's Daughters of Ware, Mass.; the Willing Workers of Stanley, Kans.; the Methodist Missionary Society of Franklin, Vt.; the Liberty Centre Missionary Band of Byron, Neb., and the Missionary Aid Society of the Baptist Church at Gaine's Mill, Md.

Some of the individual contributors to the fund incidentally mention facts in their letters which show that their gifts are of a kind that our Lord loves to receive—gifts which are the fruits of self denial:

I stayed away from socials and earned the money I send in that way, writes Verna Sims of Goshen City School, Ind. Another gift the sender of which modestly conceals her name, but desires that her money shall be sent "In His Name," comes from Fort Scott, Kans. She writes:

I am a poor girl and am able to do so little for

Encourage the Arts.

WE are constantly, in pulpit and on printed page, discoursing about the influence of books, but how little is said about the influence of pictures. Thank God for good pictures. They educate us for both worlds. God loves them, and hangs them on the morning and evening sky with loops of fire. The clouds are pictures in water-colors. No people in our midst deserve more than our artists, or get so little. Those shadows on the pictures are made out of their own sorrows. That crimson hue was penciled with their own blood. Do not throw your condemnation about too indiscriminately. Do not condemn a picture because it was born in America instead of Italy, or imitate those who, ignorant of fine-art, gabble about perspective and striking chiaroscuro, and admirable foreshortening. What injustices and hardships painters have suffered in all ages! No men do such great work for so little pay. You go to the vendue, and perhaps there is not more than one bid while a beautiful masterpiece lingers under the auctioneer's mallet, but there are ten bids for a great splash of yellow ochre and ultramarine. Plenty of sale for images in plaster of paris, but for the sculptor who cuts a statue out of his own soul, only here and there a solitary admirer. There came under my own observation a story of art struggle thrilling and full of romance. I had it from the heroine herself. Edmonia Lewis, a girl of half Indian and half African parentage, at nine years of age, walking along the streets of Boston, saw a statue of Benjamin Franklin, the first work of sculpture she had ever seen. She looked at it. She said she felt her soul expanding, and thought, "I can do that." She heard of a man who was a friend of her uncle and found him. As she went into the room, he lifted his eyes over his nose and asked her what she wanted. "I replied, 'I saw a figure standing on a rock in the street, and I want to make something like it.' He laid down his newspaper and smiled, and gave her a letter to a sculptor. The sculptor received her sores and ally, but gave her a model of a man's foot, and told her to go home and work that out. The work done, she brought it to the artist, and he destroyed it. He gave her another model. After some weeks she brought it back, and he destroyed that. The third time she came, and then he uttered the first encouraging word, and told her she had the soul of an artist. He then gave her the model of a lady's hand, the copy of which she sold, getting ten dollars for it, the first money she had ever earned. She put her shingle out in Boston; on it: "Edmonia Lewis, Artist." At twelve years of age she had fifteen hundred dollars in the bank. Her patrons felt she had talents that ought to be cultivated and sent her to Italy. At twelve years of age she crossed the Atlantic Ocean alone. By letters of introduction she found her way from England to Italy, and hired the studio that once belonged to Canova. Charles Sumner, and men like him, visited her studio. She has her works of art to-day in the prominent galleries of Europe and America. But from that humble start in Boston, with all the disadvantages of her race, to the recognition of some of the first artists of the world—what a prolonged struggle! In all possible ways, let us encourage those who are with chisel or brush contending for livelihood and a name. As far as your means may make it appropriate, gather works of art into your home. It is not so much the books your children read as the pictures they look at that will make indelible impression. The pictures of any age decide its civilization or barbarism. The frescoes brought up from Pompeii show the abomination of the times when that city was in power. Pure and elevated art implies a good state of public morals. There are so many evil influences abroad that we need all the fascinations of art to aid in the attempt to make the world better.

Your Health.

HOW many departures of prominent men from this life! Hardly ever such long lists of demises. Every morning and evening, I have noticed it. Without any epidemic, the sudden changes in the weather seem to have ushered an unusual number of our population into the next existence. Pneumonia and the grippe seem to have cut the widest swath. We cannot be too careful in this changeable climate. Do not let us through pride doff some garment we need, because it does not look well enough. Life is a precious investment and we ought not unnecessarily risk it. If our duty demands exposure to climatic changes, then we go ahead; but there is no crown of martyrdom for carelessness. We ought to have our worldly and spiritual affairs in such shape that a cold, or a fever, or a chill would not perturb us. There is a land of eternal summer and pneumonia is only a gate into it. God's heart is so young that he is not satisfied unless he has around him, in his mansion, an ever-increasing throng of young people, and hence he takes our children. God has the celestial banquet spread, and he wants the guests to come in and take their places. If we only knew how bright the next world is for those who love God, the most popular place on earth would be the sepulchre. I have heard those who were imprisoned during our civil war say how anxious they felt on the day when a certain number of prisoners were to be exchanged, and sent northward or southward. Only a few could go, and they were so anxious to hear their own names called. Oh! what a disappointment to those who had to stay. Oh! the gladness of those who were led out of prison. Now, while we stay on earth we are incarcerated amid hardships and temptations and trials; but as God calls the roll we go out one by one. For us then, the war will be ended. Why should there be any melancholy about being set forever free? I build a great bannister, Job throws on it a faggot, and David a faggot, and St. Paul a faggot, and St. John a faggot until it illumines all the earth and all the heavens. It is a bannister of victory. "They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more, neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat; for the Lamb, which is in the midst of the throne shall lead them to living fountains of water, and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes."

Mothers of Great and Good Men

WOMEN are apt to complain that their lot is without influence. On the contrary, their lot is full of dignity and importance. If they do not lead armies, if they are not state officers, or Congressional orators, they mould the souls and minds of men, who do, and are; and give the initial touch that lasts through life. The conviction of the mother's influence over the fate of her children is old as the race itself; ancient history abounds with examples; and even the destinies of the gods are represented as in its power. It was the mothers of ancient Rome that made ancient Rome great; it was the Spartan mothers that made the Spartan heroes. Those sons went out conquerors whose mothers armed them with the command, "With your shield, or on it, my son!"

The power of the mother in forming the character of the child is beyond calculation. Can any time separate the name of Monica from that of her son Augustine? Never despairing, even when her son was deep sunk in profligacy, watching, pleading, praying with such tears and fervor that the Bishop of Carthage cried out in admiration, "Go thy ways; it is impossible that the son of these tears should perish!" And she lived to see the child of her love all that her heart desired. Nor is there in all literature more noble passages than those which St. Augustine consecrates to the memory of a parent whom all ages have crowned with the loftiest graces of motherhood.

Bishop Hall says of his mother: "She was a woman of rare sanctity." And from her he derived that devoted spirit and prayerful dignity which gave him such unbounded influence in the church to which his life was consecrated. The "Divine George Herbert" owed to his mother a still greater debt, and the famous John Newton proposes himself as "an example for the encouragement of mothers to do their duty faithfully to their children." Everyone is familiar with the picture which represents Dr. Doddridge's mother teaching him, before he could read, the Old and New Testament history from the painted tiles in the chimney corner. Cowley, Thomson, Campbell, Goethe, Victor Hugo, Schiller and the Schlegels, Canning, Lord Brougham, Curran, and hundreds of our great men may say with Pierre Vidal,

"If aught of goodness or of grace
Be mine, hers be the glory;
She led me on in wisdom's path
And set the light before me."

Perhaps there was never a more wonderful example of maternal influence than that of the Wesleys' mother. To use her own words, she cared for her children as "one who works together with God in the saving of a soul." She never considered herself absolved from this care, and her letters to her sons when they were men are the wonder of all who read them. Another prominent instance is that of Madame Bonaparte over her son Napoleon. This is what he says of her: "She suffered nothing but what was grand and elevated to take root in our souls. She abhorred lying, and passed over none of our faults." How large a part the mother of Washington played in the formation of her son's character we have only to turn to Irving's Life of Washington to see. And it was her greatest honor and reward when the world was echoing with his renown, to listen and calmly reply, "He has been a good son, and he has done his duty as a man."

John Quincy Adams owed everything to his mother. The cradle hymns of his childhood were songs of liberty, and as soon as he could lisp his prayers she taught him to say Collins' noble lines, "How sleep the brave that sink to rest." No later instance of the influence of a mother in the formation of character can be adduced than that of Gerald Massey. His mother roused in him his hatred of wrong, his love of liberty, his pride in honest, hard-working poverty, and Massey, in his later days of honor and comfort often spoke with pride of those years when his mother taught her children to live in honest independence on rather less than a dollar and a half a week. The similar instance of President Garfield and his mother is too well known to need more than mention.

There can be no doubt of the illimitable influence of the mother in the formation of her child's character. The stern, passionate piety of Mrs. Wesley made saints and preachers of her children; the ambition and bravery of Madame Bonaparte molded her son into a soldier, and the beautiful union of these qualities helped to form the hero beloved of all lands, George Washington. I do not say that mothers can give genius to their sons; but all mothers can do for their children what Monica did for Augustine, what Madame Bonaparte did for Napoleon, what Mrs. Washington did for her son George, what Gerald Massey's mother did for him, what ten thousands of good mothers all over the world are doing this day patiently molding, hour by hour, year by year, that cumulative force which we call character. And if mothers do this duty honestly, whether their sons are private citizens or public men, they will "rise up and call them blessed."

Annie E. Parr

BRIEF NOTES.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's annual "Char Balance Sheet" will appear in our next issue, and will be found full of interest to every reader who has contrived to these good causes during the past year.

"What do you consider the greatest discovery you ever made?" an interviewer asked James Y. Simpson, the eminent Scotch surgeon, the discoverer of chloroform. "That I have a viour," he replied, without hesitation.

The village of Lone Rock, Wis., has set a good example to larger communities. Its Board has been induced by a lady pastor of a church to pass an ordinance forbidding the sale of cigarettes within the village limits.

The Baptist Missionary Union and a whole Baptist denomination has sustained a reavement in the death of Dr. J. N. Murdock, honorary secretary of the Union, which took place at Clifton Springs, N. Y., on Feb. 10.

Of the three hundred and fifty million persons under the rule of Queen Victoria only millions profess faith in the Bible. Two hundred millions are Hindoos, sixty millions are Mohammedans and forty millions belong to other Christian faiths.

Rev. B. Fay Mills has been holding evangelistic meetings at Kokoma, Ind. Nearly all evangelical churches in the city united in the movement. The meetings were held in the Opera House, with overflow meetings in the neighboring churches. Over 700 persons made profession of faith.

We are asked to publish a warning against responding to appeals which are being extensively made for the Hardy Library Association at Chief, O. T. Books and money sent there are to be misapplied, as it has no library, nor any of organizations for helping the Indians which appeal describes.

A farewell reception was tendered on Feb. 25 to Dr. E. E. Chivers, who has been elected General Secretary of the Baptist Young People's Union. The meeting was held in the Central Baptist Church of New York. Pastors and young people joined in congratulating Dr. Chivers and wishing him success in his new office.

Eleven churches in the Eastern District of Brooklyn, N. Y., united recently in evangelistic services in the First Reformed Church. Among them were Baptist, Methodist, Congregational and Presbyterian churches. Rev. J. F. Carpenter of the Central Presbyterian Church, in charge of the meetings.

A number of bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States and Canada have arranged to attend the third Lambeth Conference in England in May next. The conference will take a survey of the work of the Church over the world and discuss plans for its extension. It will also celebrate the thirteen hundredth anniversary of the landing in England of St. Augustine.

Recently compiled statistics of communications of the churches in England and Wales show that the Church of England has 1,778,351 communicants; the Wesleyans 529,786; Congregationalists 406,716; Baptists, 316,569; six other denominations have an aggregate of 554,652, making the total Nonconformist churches 1,807,723, or 29,372 more than the Church of England. The Nonconformist also have nearly a million more children in Sunday Schools than the Established Church. The total school attendance is 5,433,698.

Dr. Charles Cuthbert Hall has been unanimously elected to the President's chair of the Theological Seminary. In accepting the position he heartily endorsed the declaration of his predecessor, Dr. Thomas S. Hastings, who said the Seminary intended to govern itself and the General Assembly must keep its hands off. To this Hall added that his policy would be a peaceful and peace-seeking policy, and he hoped to meet with a similar spirit on the part of those who conferred with them in matters of doctrine and principle.

A new Institutional church has been opened in New York. It is in connection with the Washington Square Methodist Episcopal Church, Fourth street, a locality in which such a church is likely to be exceedingly useful. It has been constructed out of the parish house adjoining the church at a cost of $10,000. A dining-room, kitchen, gymnasium, library, and reading-rooms with accommodations are provided under its roof. A number of sleeping-rooms which will be rented to young men, are tastefully furnished and will do to the income of the church.

A handsome gift to church work in New York has been made by Miss Serena Rhinelander. A building and ten city lots, aggregating in value $300,000, has been placed under certain conditions at the disposal of the workers of St. James Episcopal Mission. The land is on East Eighty-eighth street between First and Second avenues. The building contains a chapel, accommodations for a kindergarten school, a library, and girls' clubs, a swimming bath, and a number of class rooms. Miss Rhinelander's sole condition that its usefulness shall be proved. If at the end of five years it is demonstrated that it is serving its purpose, she will deed it to the Mission.

A change has been made in the place of the Annual Convention of the Baptist Young People's Union. The refusal of the Frank Line Association to grant satisfactory terms for travel to Brooklyn, N. Y., was laid before the Executive Committee, and that body reluctantly decided to stop preparations in that city and hold the Convention at Chattanooga, Tenn. The Southern Passenger Association will give one-fare rates for the round trip on this fact decided the committee to go to Chattanooga in stead of Brooklyn. It is a great disappointment to the Brooklyn people, who had Ambrose Park for the meetings.

A South Carolina correspondent of the Independent calls attention to the earnest efforts of the colored children of that section to an education. He says that the colored children willingly work for a long time, accepting of menial some white child's disused school-bag, when an opportunity is afforded, with distance to attend school. Readers of this paper who have sent money to aid in the erection of a school at Mayesville, S. C., will be glad to see the contribution of the students previously mentioned is a pleasure to give money to a cause so fully appreciated, and which will be so gratefully appreciated. Only a few hundred dollars are now needed for the completion of the Mayesville fund.

An African Tyrant.

WHAT cruelties the natives of Central Africa suffer at the hands of the petty kings who rule over them, may be inferred from the reports received of the condition of the country of Benin in the Niger region. To Western ears the stories of wholesale massacre and cannibalism are almost incredible, but they are attested by responsible travelers who say that King Drumah is not much worse than other kings in Africa, but is likely to be punished because he did not limit his bloodthirsty operations to his own subjects. About two months ago he ordered the massacre of a party of unarmed Englishmen who were on their way to his capital to arrange the terms of a commercial treaty with him. There were only eight white men in the party, including Mr. Phipps, the Consul-General of the Niger territory, and they went without arms, or military protection, in the belief that their peaceable intentions might be evident to the king and people. About two hundred native carriers, bringing presents for the king, accompanied them. They were well treated in the villages on the way, but when they were only a few miles from the capital they suddenly found themselves surrounded and the whole party was massacred, except two white men who were wounded. These two crawled into the bush and hid there for several days, until they could make their way to the coast. The rashness of the party in entering the Benin territory without protection seems inexplicable, in view of reports which were brought from the territory by travelers who had visited it. They averred that they saw the remains of corpses everywhere. Executions were of daily occurrence, and seemed to be the normal amusement of the people. It is the king's custom to kill every year on the day when he celebrates the anniversary of his father's death, all the prisoners he has on hand. Every national celebration is a carnival of human blood. The fetish priests of the Ju-Ju, the national divinity, are the most powerful persons in the kingdom, and under their advice the king metes out death to his own subjects as to prisoners. If the heat of the weather has been excessive, or there has been little rain, or too much rain, if there is joy or mourning, prisoners are put to death. A party of explorers whose presents to the king had won his special favor, were invited to a feast at which several prisoners were to be killed. The explorers declined to be present and protested against the slaughter, but it took place. Some of the victims were crucified by tying the right wrist and foot to one tree and the left foot and wrist to another tree about four feet apart. Others died under successive mutilations. Hanging, drowning and shooting are variations in the modes of execution. It is no wonder that Benin is called in the language of the people the City of Blood. The town has been captured by an expedition of a thousand well-armed men which was sent by the British Government to punish the king for the murder of the whites in January last, and it is possible to put an end to his sanguinary orgies. The town is reeking with the blood of recent victims. It is now as it was in the days of the Psalmist:

The dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty. (Ps. 74: 20.)

Historic Gavel.
A present which is sure to be prized has been sent to Vice-President-elect Hobart by a contractor of Paterson, N. J. It appears that the War Department was instructed last year to arrange for the erection of a monument on the site of the house at Wakefield, Va., in which George Washington was born. After considerable search the brick foundations of the house were found, the house itself having been destroyed by fire in 1735. The debris of the burned building had fallen into the cellar, and upon it was the accumulated soil of more than a century and a-half. In the centre of the heap a sugar-nut tree had taken root, and had grown to large proportions. As the Government wished the monument to be on the exact place of Washington's birth, it was necessary to remove the tree to make room for the foundations of the monument. The contractor who removed it has had a gavel made out of the wood and mounted in gold, which he has now sent to Mr. Hobart to be used by him in the United States Senate. It bears a suitable inscription, stating to whom it is presented and recounting the origin of the tree from the timber of which it was made. The gift is appropriate, and when Mr. Hobart uses it in the Senate chamber its associations will doubtless often recur to his mind. We may hope that it will serve to remind him, in his responsible office, of the eternal principles of righteousness and patriotic self-sacrifice which the great man, with whom it is identified, hoped would ever characterize the Government that he and his distinguished colleagues founded. So the gavel may have a useful significance to the user, and the senators, if a self-seeking spirit should ever be manifested among them, and will speak to them as did the symbol of priestly appointment of God's ancient people.

The Lord said unto Moses, Bring Aaron's rod before the testimony to be kept for a token. (Numbers 17: 10.)

Spain Must Explain.

An international difficulty appears likely to arise between our government and that of Spain out of the death of Dr. Ricardo Ruiz, a Cuban dentist who had acquired American citizenship. Dr. Ruiz formerly resided in Philadelphia, but returned to Cuba on the death of his father to settle his estate. He had an American passport and intended to return as soon as the business was finished, but was detained, and finally he married and settled down at Guanabacoa. On Jan. 16 last, a train was derailed in Cuba and several Spanish officers were captured by the insurgents. Dr. Ruiz was arrested on the charge of having assisted in placing on the tracks the obstruction which caused the derailment of the train. He had, however, a number of witnesses who, on hearing of his arrest, went to the Spanish authorities and testified to the impossibility of Dr. Ruiz being concerned in the affair, they having been in his company three miles away from the accident. Fourteen days after his arrest it was announced that he had died in prison. General Lee at once demanded an investigation and went to the prison to enforce the demand. An autopsy was performed which disclosed the fact that the death of Dr. Ruiz was caused by a blow on the head. Prisoners in the jail said that he had been subject to torture, and that they had heard piercing shrieks coming from his cell in the night. The facts having been communicated to the State Department, Secretary Olney has demanded from Spain a thorough inquiry and if the facts are as reported, she will be required to make such reparation as is in her power. That course is necessary to the honor of our government and for the safety of our citizens abroad. It should be known the world over, that however humble a man may be, if he is a citizen of the United States it is not safe to oppress him, or do him a mischief. Such protection is given to those who are citizens of the kingdom of God, although the world frequently forgets the fact.

When they went from one nation to another, from one kingdom to another people; he suffered no man to do them wrong: yea he reproved kings for their sakes. (Ps. 105: 13.)

A Hero at the Windlass.

A rare act of heroism is reported by the Morning Oregonian. It appears that at the Young America Mine at Rossland, B. C., a man named Hemsworth was employed at the windlass by which the buckets laden with ore are drawn up a shaft a hundred and fifty feet deep. One day recently a heavy bucket had nearly reached the top of the shaft, when the crank of the windlass snapped off short. Hemsworth saw the windlass whirling around at a frightful rate of speed as the bucket shot down the shaft, and realized that it meant death to the men below. Jumping forward he threw his body upon the cogs of the swiftly-revolving wheel, thrusting his arm quires that when there have been such absences the report of the whole proceedings shall be read over in the presence of all the commissioners before a decision is made. The official stenographer was therefore instructed to prepare a verbatim report. While he was working upon it he accidentally upset a bottle of ink over his notes, which so completely obliterated the characters on a number of pages that they cannot be read even with the aid of a microscope. The commissioners are very reluctant to go through the labor and expense of another trial, but they cannot give a legal decision without it. Meanwhile the captain's salary goes on, and no action can be taken. It was a fortunate accident for the captain, but his enemies will probably take care that he does not finally escape, but is tried over again. Happily, that can never happen to the Christian whose sins have been blotted out, not merely the record of them.

I, even I, am he that blot out thy transgressions for mine own sake and will not remember thy sins. (Isa. 43: 25.)

Presidential Autographs Missing.

Thieves have been at work in the Congressional Library, Washington, D. C. Reports reached Mr. Spofford, the librarian, some time ago, that autographs of priceless historical value were being offered for sale. Mr. Spofford was naturally anxious to secure them for the nation. From a description of one of them that he received, he thought they must be spurious, as there was already such a document in the library, and it was little likely that any duplicate was in existence. To refresh his memory on the subject, he referred to the archives, but could not find the autograph, though he knew that it had been there and it was entered on the catalogue. A further search showed that others were missing. Among them were letters signed by George Washington, John Hancock, Benedict Arnold, and Washington's diary for 1784. Two clerks of the library have been arrested on suspicion, and it is hoped that at least some of the documents may be recovered. Happily, the value of the lost documents is only sentimental. Their contents were known, and if they are not recovered the national welfare will not be affected. It is different with those who are trying to rob us of our Bible. Not only our hopes of the future, but our present civilization is based upon it, and if the ancient documents of which it is composed were taken from us, the mainstay of our faith would be gone.

The Lord commanded us to do all these statutes for our good always that he might preserve us alive as it is at this day. (Deut. 6: 24.)

A Fatal Snowball.

A press dispatch from St. Paul, Minn., reports the distressing results of boyish thoughtlessness. On Feb. 3, a boy thirteen years old, son of a prominent citizen of St. Paul, in a spirit of boyish mischief, threw a snowball at a man who was driving past on a cutter. The snowball missed the man and hit the horse, a spirited animal, which, startled by the sudden blow, ran away. The runaway resulted directly in three other runaways, in which several persons were hurt and a great deal of damage was done. On the following day two of the injured persons called on the father of the boy who threw the snowball and, telling him how the accident had occurred, said they should hold him responsible for damages. It happened that the boy's father was at the time in a highly nervous condition through a variety of causes, and this demand seemed the last straw on his heavy burden. Without making any reply to his callers, the man walked into a rear room, took a revolver from a drawer and shot himself. Death was instantaneous. Thus, from the one boyish act resulted loss, suffering and death. How the boy must have wished he had never thrown that snowball! If we remembered that the consequences of our acts and words are beyond our control, we should all be more circumspect than we are. The Scriptural reminder of the possibility of evil being inadvertently caused, ought never to be forgotten.

and shoulder under the whirling broken crank. The iron struck him a terrific blow, crushing bone and sinew and tearing a ghastly wound, but the windlass stopped with the bucket only a few feet above the heads of the men stooping at their work at the bottom of the shaft. The superintendent saw the accident from a distance and ran to the relief of the brave man. He blocked the machinery and released him. Then, as he saw the fearful nature of Hemsworth's injuries, he said: "How dare you do such a thing?" The injured man gasped, "I had to save the boys." Surgeons amputated the arm and hope to save his life. As we wonder and admire the man who could thus sacrifice himself to save his comrades, we remember Him against whom the taunt was hurled:

He saved others; himself he cannot save. (Matt. 27: 42.)

A Record Blotted Out.

A singular accident is delaying action in the case of a police captain in Long Island City, N. Y. Charges were made against the captain nearly a year ago, and he was placed on trial. Sometimes one of the commissioners would be absent from a hearing, and sometimes another would be away, so that when the case closed there was no one among them who had heard all the evidence. The law re-

SAUL CONVERTED.

Sunday School Lesson for March 14.

Acts 9: 1-20. Golden Text, I Tim. 1:

15. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

HEN Stephen, the Christ-like martyr, died in full view of an open heaven which his very face reflected, and in the very act of prayer for his murderers, it is significantly said that "the witnesses laid down their clothes at a young man's feet whose name was Saul." (Acts. 7: 58). In the purposes of God, the zealous persecutor and the Christ-like martyr must come in contact. Saul was undoubtedly the great instigator of the persecution against the Christians, and there was more than he knew in the act of those who, to facilitate the execution of the martyr, laid their loose outer garments at his feet. Saul was an honest man acting from conviction; a pupil of that Gamaliel who had led the priestly council at Jerusalem to take God into their reckoning in their dealings with the apostles.

The young Saul was one who could not do a thing by halves. He was an Old Testament believer, taught by Gamaliel "according to the perfect manner of the law of the fathers, and was zealous toward God." (Acts 22: 3). Thus it was no spirit of cruelty which actuated him in the persecution of the Christians in which he became so prominent a leader; he says himself, "I verily thought with myself that I ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus of Nazareth." (Acts 26: 9). But here was the very crucial point. Devoted to God and to his service as he was, the young zealot did not know God, and was not at this time guided by him. He was willing to give all his time, strength, energy, talent, influence, into the crusade he had undertaken against the Christians, and undoubtedly in his own eyes he was another Joshua, bent on exterminating the enemies of Jehovah from the holy city and the holy land. But he was Self-Guided.

"I verily thought with myself," he did not, like Moses and David, inquire of the Lord. Thus the self-constituted defender of the faith of his fathers was really become the great enemy of the God whom he thought to serve. To serve God in our way instead of his way is practically to work against him. "Thus it came to pass that this earnest devotee of the God of love thought to please him when he was "breathing out threatenings and slaughter against the disciples of the Lord!"

In the course of his pursuit of the Christians after the death of Stephen, "even unto strange cities," Paul drew near Damascus, armed with letters from the chief priests to the synagogues, demanding that the heretics should be delivered up and brought in chains to Jerusalem. But an unexpected interruption met him. It was midday, the sun was brilliantly shining when suddenly, a wondrous "light from heaven" far outshining even an eastern sun, shone round about him. "It was so dazzling that he and all his company, unable to endure it, fell face foremost to the earth. All saw the light but only Saul heard a voice saying: 'Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?' 'Who art thou, Lord?' 'I am Jesus whom thou persecutest.'"

The zealous hero of the persecution, the self-made Joshua, saw himself a traitor to his God, a lost, sinful, misguided man, the very chief of sinners, persecutor of the Church of God. It was a tremendous revelation. All his former devotion had been really offered to an unknown God, he had not yet seen the Lord as Isaiah did, or he would have been a broken undone man; he had never heard his voice, or he would have ceased to direct himself. Now God had met him, and revealed to him that his whole life had been one great, terrible mistake. Would he now yield to God or hold to his own way? This is the point to which every sinner must come before he can be born again of the Spirit of God. If he does not come to see himself utterly undone and to accept the fact of the utter bankruptcy of all he is and all he has been and done, his conversion is only a superficial one, which has to be later on supplemented by a consecration which ought to have been a part of his first receiving of Jesus.

"The spirit should fail before me and the souls which I have made," says Jehovah. (Isa. 57: 16). Paul's soul did fail. Trembling and astonished, he said, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" Paul understood now that he could no longer dispose of himself; he already, and very really belonged to another; and that other was Jehovah Jesus, whom he had been persecuting in his disciples!

"Arise and go into the city, and it shall be told thee what thou shalt do;" and blind with the glorious light of an opened heaven, and led by the hand of others, he took his way toward Damascus. But who knows what took place during the three days that followed: the revelation from heaven so overpowered him that he could neither eat nor drink, and we may be quite sure that he did not sleep either. All his past life now was seen in a totally different light, now he understood the radiant, angel face of Stephen. Now he understood what love to enemies meant for Jesus, whom he had blasphemed, showed it to him. And with all the zeal of his young heart, Saul surrendered himself and the persecutor became the disciple. He rejoiced afterwards to testify that the Gospel which he preached was "not after man. For I neither received it of man, neither was I taught it, but by the revelation of Jesus Christ." (Gal. 1: 11, 12), and his whole after life bore witness to the truth of his statement before king Agrippa, "I was not disobedient unto the heavenly vision."

Once fully surrendered to his God, it was not a hard thing that this accomplished Pharisee, and well known persecutor, should have to be dependent on an obscure disciple, whose only recommendation was his faith for the help and direction which God had promised him. Things which are difficult, almost impossible to our nature, become quite natural as soon as we let God have possession of our will. Meanwhile God was preparing Ananias. This disciple knew the voice which called, "Ananias," and he responded, "Behold, I am here, Lord." "Arise and go into the street which is called Straight, and inquire in the house of Judas for one called Saul of Tarsus, for behold he prayeth and hath seen in a vision a man named Ananias coming in and putting his hand on him, that he might receive his sight." "Lord," answered Ananias, "I have heard by many of this man, how much evil he hath done to thy saints at Jerusalem; and here he hath authority from the chief priests to bind all that call upon thy name."

"Go thy way," was the instant answer, "for he is a chosen vessel unto me, to bear my name before the Gentiles, and kings, and the children of Israel, for I will shew him how great things he must suffer for my name's sake." And Ananias had no more to say: he who before God trembled at the name of Saul goes to him and calls him brother.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

FROM this history of Christianity in its early days we obtain several types of conversion. In last week's lesson we had the man who was waiting for instruction and on receiving it passed easily into the kingdom. The conversion of Cornelius in the tenth chapter was of a similar order. The jailer at Philippi, described in the sixteenth chapter, was preceded by terror and distress. In this week's lesson we have another type. All the subjects arrived at the same issue, but by different ways. So it is still. One person merely needs instruction, another needs spiritual enlightenment, another needs a distressing experience, and another needs a revelation. Saul's conversion was the great comfort to those who have to suffer for their faith. Christ sees it and suffices with them. But that is not all. Christ has pity for the persecutor. He likens him an ox who kicks against the goad, the sharp pointed weapon with which the driver spurs him to his work. The more he kicks, the more he is hurt. He has undertaken work which must involve him suffering. It is a similar proverb to that among us of the man who runs his head against a stone wall. Christ has compassion for him, in spite of the mischief he is doing. Then Gamaliel was right. Saul was contending against God. Humbly asks guidance and is directed where to look. Still blind from the dazzling vision he led into the city. Three days he sits in darkness, too much absorbed in the revelation and all it portends, even to eat. Then Ananias, a humble believer of whom have not heard before, is sent to him, and salutes him as Brother. The film is moved from his eyes and in more than a physical sense he is able to see. He sees his mistakes; he sees that he is altogether in the wrong and immediately, with courage, he declares his changed attitude and preaches the very Gospel which had come to Damascus to extirpate. The stalwart, energetic, indomitable servant of God was brought into the kingdom. So God takes a man with strong power and harnesses them in his service. There is no need to change the character or disposition of the man. It is necessary only to apply them to a different object. Saul the restless, untrusting, relentless persecutor becomes the missionary preacher with his old characteristics employed in new service.

Breathing threatenings and slaughter.

"Why does not God protect his children from persecution?" asks a troubled Christian. "Why does he allow them to be harassed and put to death without interposing their defence?" The answer is not completely satisfactory, but it is suggestive. "I stood at the window of a mansion with the owner and I saw his dogs chase his favorite chickens. I said to him: 'Why do you allow this?' He smiled and said: 'Let them alone. The birds will come here all the quicker, and I want them.'"

A light from heaven.

It is this to convert some people. They are so self-confident, so sure that they know everything and that they are quite right, that only the Spirit can open their eyes. A familiar author describes a strange phenomenon in the mountains of Africa. Three persons were threading their way through weird peaks which were almost in darkness, owing to the giant peaks which shut out the light of day. "Now," said the guide, "we must wait." They all sat down in front of a chasm. Presently a beam of light shone across the chasm as if from a searchlight. It seems that once in every twenty-four hours the sun came to a place in the heavens whence its rays shot through a cavity in the mountain, and then all was dark again. But for a minute the light revealed a projecting rock on the other side of the chasm which almost bridged it, so that it was easy to step over the intervening space. But the step must be taken at the right time, or the traveler might be dashed to pieces.

It is hard for thee. Two young men were at college together. One of them was dissipated, and the other, who came from the same town, and knew him and his family well, expostulated with him. "No," was the reply, "I do not believe in being so strait-laced. I am to enjoy life and take all the pleasure I can reach. I shall be young only once. My friend begged him to desist, but would not laugh at for his pains. Many an afterward he met his old college friend at a ten-cent lodging house. He recognized him with difficulty, for the man was a real wreck, looking ten years older than himself, though of the same age. He was dirty and his clothing was in tatters. He did not seem to have prospered," he said. "No," was the reply, "I have had a miserable life. I should have been far better if I had taken your advice. Even if there is no life after this, it would have been better for me to have led a clean, virtuous life. I have suffered torments and believe I am at this moment the most miserable creature on earth."

Winter Pleasures.

Sleighing and Skating in the Public Parks—A Frolic on Runners—Wholesome and Exhilarating Sport.

AS Winter wanes toward Spring, and the sharp frosts of February and March threaten to suddenly be transformed to the mildness of the approaching vernal season, the lovers of skating and sleighing experience a momentary pang of regret. While it is probably true that the vast majority of our people prefer the weather to the frigid blasts we have experienced, it is equally true that there are thousands of hardy natures, fond of exercise and animation of out-door life, who love the rough, blustery winds of winter, which bring them assurance of vivid sport on the ringing steel. Photographs on this page, taken a few days ago, give a hint of how New Yorkers amuse themselves in the snowy season. In Central Park, and on the adjacent boulevards, the sleighing this winter has been exceptional, and the vision of many hundreds of elegant cutters flashing past, drawn by their steppers, with pompon and bells, has been worth a half-hour's halt to see. Almost every variety of sleigh, from the low-seated, old-fashioned affair, to the high-stylish Russian machine on runners, may be seen on the drive, and the sparkling eyes and happy faces of their occupants show how keen is their enjoyment of the sport. But the more democratic, because less expensive, pleasure of skating is the winter prime that affords relaxation to my thousands of the younger generation. On all good "skating days," when the ice has reached a desired thickness, certain of the public lakes are opened to the public. There is no reticent sight to observe a good-natured, grateful crowd of skaters, gliding like birds on the smooth ice, describing all sorts of curves, dashes and antics on the mirror-like surface. As the lakes are well guarded, accidents are rare, and save an occasional hump or contusion caused by an awkward slip, seldom comes to the skater. It is a delightful pastime, for there are rarely more than a few days' skating in a season; hence they are disposed to make the most of it and extract from it all the pleasure they can while it lasts.

Arabian Salesman's Way.

Our ladies sometimes complain of the persistency of some salesmen in the stores. What would they think, were they to encounter such a salesman as that described by a lady traveler in Tunis, in a recent letter to Travel. She says: "Some of the vendors of haiks, fezes, and Oriental silks would have been invaluable at a charity bazaar. They were so amiable, so ingenuously, above all so persistent. 'Spik Engli,' exclaims one in a lovely blue haik, reaching up and extending his hand with the ardor of an old friend to the leader of the party. 'Touchez la,' and he sweeps the whole party off irresistibly into his particular den, spreading out scarfs, mantles, embroidery, and chattering nineteen to the dozen. He flings a silk scarf around the shoulders of one of the ladies,

'Buy this for madame. Yes, monsieur, very pretty, very good.' Madame and monsieur happen never to have exchanged a word; she looks stony, and he embarrassed. Next the indefatigable one fixes on the most timid and girlish-looking of the party. 'Buy it, mademoiselle. Very pretty. You will have a rich husband. Lots of money. Yes, only trente francs.' In a few minutes he is down at fifteen. Some one suggests eight. He moves off with a gesture of supreme contempt. The party turns to leave; he flies after them. 'Combien, monsieur, combien.' The eight francs is offered again and accepted: the salesman shakes hands again, exclaiming, 'Good-night, good-night,' with great fervor (it being about 11 A. M.), and we go away."

Close of the Mother's Congress.

All who had to do with the management of the National Mothers' Congress in Washington deserve to be congratulated. It is now universally admitted to have been a great success. Aside from the regular sessions in the banquet room of the Arlington, meetings were held in the First Baptist Church and additional speakers were provided, thus making a double programme. Among those who made addresses at the latter place were Miss Newton, of Chicago, Miss Jeannette Richards, Mrs. Putnam and other ladies. Altogether the success of the congress has afforded the liveliest gratification to managers, delegates and all concerned. A headquarters will be kept up in Washington, and a congress will be held annually in that city. Mrs. Hearst and also Mrs. Birney, who contributed so greatly to the success of the congress, have earned the loving gratitude of their sisters everywhere, which the resolution of thanks adopted by the delegates heartily expressed.

A Honeymoon Among Monkeys.

Philip Robinson, the well-known writer and traveler, relates this most entertaining experience:

I was married in India. I engaged for our honeymoon a little house sixteen miles away, on the steep white cliff of the Nebudda river. Close beside it was a little hut, where a holy man lived in charge of an adjoining shrine. It was a wonderful place altogether, and while my wife went in to change her dress, the servants laid breakfast on the veranda overlooking the river. At the first clatter of the plates, there began to come down from the big tree that overshadowed the house, and up the trees that grew in the ravine behind it, from the house-roof itself, from everywhere, a multitude of solemn monkeys. They came up singly and in couples and in families, and took their places without noise or fuss on the veranda and sat there. When everything was ready, the breakfast all laid, the monkeys all seated—I went in to call my wife.

"Breakfast is ready and they are all waiting," I said.

"Who are waiting?" she asked in dismay. "I thought we were going to be alone, and I was just coming down in my dressing gown."

"Never mind," I said, "the people about here are not very fashionably dressed themselves. They wear pretty much the same things all the year round."

And so my wife came out. Imagine, then, her astonishment. In the middle of the veranda stood her breakfast table, and all the rest of the space, as well as the railings and the steps, was covered with monkeys, as grave as possible and as motionless and silent as if they were stuffed. Only their eyes kept blinking and their little round ears kept twitching. Laughing heartily—at which the monkeys only looked all the graver—my wife sat down. "Will they eat anything?" asked she. "Try them," I said. So she picked up a biscuit and threw it among the company. And the result! About three hundred monkeys jumped up in the air like one, and just for one instant there was a riot that defies description. The next instant every monkey was sitting in its place as solemn as if it had never moved. Only their eyes winked and their ears twitched. My wife threw another biscuit, and again the riot, and then another and another and another. But at length we had given all that we had

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS.

It's everybody's business
In this old world of ours,
To root up all the weeds he finds
And make room for the flowers;
So that every little garden,
No matter where it lies,
May look like that which God once made,
And called it Paradise.

It's everybody's business
When a man has fallen down,
To put him on his feet again
And help him through the town:
Though wise and strong and perfect folks
May sneer and proudly say—
"You'd better let him take his course,
'Tis kindness thrown away."

It's everybody's business
To be full of hope and joy,
And be as merry as he can
Whatever may annoy;
For he who goes about the streets,
Parading all his pain,
Will cast a cross on other hearts
And have his own remain.

The Stepmother's Friend.

THERE seems to be a widespread interest among our readers, on the stepmother question. From a single eloquent advocate of that very much-maligned class, the defenders of the stepmother have increased until now they are found on every side. Among the letters we have received on the subject, we have space only for the following extracts:

Mrs. Nannie W. Tanner, of Pittsboro, Tex., writes:

I have such a precious jewel in the person of a stepmother that I read with great interest everything pleasant and kind in regard to them. I feel that I must say something here in praise of my dear stepmother, for surely no other was ever more deserving of appreciation and esteem than she. To begin with, she is one of the purest and most unselfish women. A deeply pious, consistent Christian, she came to fill the place of our dear mother, when I was in my sixth year, and one brother, three years older, and one four years younger than myself. How lovingly and tenderly she has always cared for us! To me she is the very embodiment of all that is pure and gentle and lovely and good. I do not see how our home could have existed without her. It is exceedingly painful to hear stepmothers spoken of disparagingly. I like to assure them all of my respect and love.

An invalid son (O. F. H.), Middleton, Mass., writes:

Personally, my brother and I, have known a stepmother's love. She has, and does, care for us as though we were her own. Patiently she has striven, lovingly and sweetly suffered, sacrificed and endured for us. With sincerity and deep filial affection, we can say, "God bless the stepmothers." May the children under the care of a stepmother always love and obey her, and seek to please her. Moreover, may they love their half-brothers and sisters, too, even as themselves.

In a Persian Tea House.

One afternoon, writes a traveler from Teheran, we found ourselves in a Persian tea-house. Now a Persian tea-house is not one of those fanciful oriental places all glittering mirrors, tinsel-roofed, with swinging silver lamps, pearl inlaid tables, silken couches, and snatches of the Koran decorating the walls, such as imaginative artists depict. More often than not they are disappointingly hovel-like. There was a crowd of Persians on a sort of earth-baked platform, with little mats in front. They kept constantly drinking cups of tea. They were an apathetic lot, till one of us picked up a brass cup and almost contaminated it by putting it to his lips. With a scream it was dragged from his hand. These Persians are strict Mohammedans, and would no more drink out of the same vessel as a dog of a Christian than they would risk their souls by eating pork. They are given to much praying in public places. Thus in the village tea-house we saw two or three men stretch out the palms of their hands, raise their eyes to the ceiling, mumble faintly, and touch the earth with their foreheads.

CHAPTER VII—Contin'd.
Steve's Opportunity.

STEVE was so much in love that the prospect did not frighten him. Jessie was not accustomed to a large income; and he thought it would be easy to obtain work, which did not chain him to a desk. Anything but that! He thought, too, as he was going to marry and settle down, his father would have some faith in his social reformation. And as he had loved Jessie's mother, surely he would feel some interest in the daughter of the woman he had once intended to make his wife. Of course there must be an interview, and Steve did fear that. Nicholas Lloyd always brought to the front the worst side of his son, and Steve recognized this result, and was angry at it.

For a little while, however, he made no movement in regard to the future. He said to Jessie, "In three weeks I will speak to your father, and I hope satisfy all his reasonable desires for your comfort, and in the interval let us be happy, darling." And for once the clever, careful little woman was willing to be happy—to take the sweetness of the present moment—to put cares out of reckoning, and all considerations as to marriage and money matters beyond her horizon. She was during these three weeks delightful. She gave Steve a great love. She allowed her best nature full freedom. She forgot to consider herself. She grew more beautiful every day. Her voice was softer, her manner more gentle. She completely captivated Steve; he thought himself to be the happiest man in New York, and was ready to assert with all his heart that "the world was well lost for love."

Also during these three weeks, Flora was married and went to her own house—a pretty little flat in Twelfth street. The furnishing and adorning of its six small rooms, was very much in Jessie's hands; and Steve went with her and helped her, and supplied many pretty accessories. And what happy thoughts of his own home he had while doing so might be seen in his eyes, in his radiant face and boyish manner. Not unfrequently these heart-dreams found expression in pretty personal ambitions; thus, one afternoon as they were unpacking a present of china from the bridegroom's employer, Jessie said:

"What lovely cups and saucers, Steve!"

"We can have a set like them."

"Oh, how delightful that will be! Do you know that this china is very fine, and consequently very expensive?"

"I think we can afford it."

"I don't like the parlor curtains, do you, Steve?"

"No indeed! I hope we shall show more taste."

Thus in the happiness of others, they laid the foundation of their own, and time went swiftly by, as it has a way of doing when the heart is light, and the days are full of joy. After Flora's marriage, Steve began to think seriously of preparing for his own, and, as a first step towards it, he resolved to see his mother and sister. As he walked up the avenue, he reproached himself with being so laggard a son, and a brother, and yet his reluctance to go home was a natural feeling. He feared his mother's calm, sad face, he feared that Alice would censure him; for it was not many months since he had heard through Jessie that he had been in New York some weeks. He had to make excuses, for he knew he would be sure to blurt out the truth, and he was sure that Jessie had occupied all his time.

It was a cold, raw morning, and as he made his way through the fast-falling flakes, he asked himself seriously if this very love had slain, or even wounded the old love. No and again no! In his heart he knew that mother and sister were just as dear as ever. But then he was sure of their love. It had been tested a thousand times and found faithful. There was no wounding if necessary. It was the treasure just safely away. Jessie's love was the treasure still in speculation. It had to be watched and cared for, and worked for until the happy hour of its appropriation arrived.

"That is the whole matter," he said positively, as he ran up the whitened steps and shook himself free of the gathered snow. How sweet and warm it was in the house! Two sweet and warm for Steve, who liked far better the snap of the frosty air and the brisk stimulant of the north-west wind. But the sweetness and warmth seemed just suitable for the lovely girl who turned with a cry of joy to welcome him:

"Oh, Steve! Steve! Is it you at last? When did you come to New York?"

"I have been here more than a week or two. I have been busy wooing a wife. Did she not tell you?"

"Who? Do you mean Jessie McAslin?"

"Yes."

"Of course you have won her. She used to talk about you without rhyme or reason."

"Does she not talk about me now?"

"I have not encouraged her to talk about you for a long time. I have begun to doubt whether she is really the best kind of wife for you."

"She is the only wife for me, Alice. And she has promised to marry me very soon."

"Steve, do not marry just yet. Wait a little."

"I thought you wanted me to marry and settle."

"I do—but—O, Steve, it is such an important thing! You will also have to tell her who you are. I don't like that—but you cannot marry her under the name of Morrison."

"Certainly I cannot."

"And how will you support her? Jessie is an ambitious woman. She loves pretty things of all kinds. I suppose all women do that. Are you going to accept the offer father made you, and go back to Wall street?"

"Not in this life, and I have a good hope that my next life will not retrograde."

"Then, pray how are you going to live? Do you think Jessie will tramp east and west with you, or even endure your long absences?"

"I shall not ask her to do either. I shall get some employment which will let me have a little freedom, and keep a home in comfort."

"But you cannot give your cake away, and then eat it. You give up your freedom for a wife. It is your own exchange. Then do not grumble at its limitations."

"How does father feel towards me?"

"I do not think he has changed his position in the least. You have not changed yours, why should he? Try now and accept the offer he leaves open to you from year to year."

"I cannot do so, Alice. I will not do a foolishness that is founded on the principle of taking without giving, and claiming without earning. I will have nothing whatever to do with stocks, and shares, and usury. I will not live on interest, and dividends, and appropriated balances."

"Very good people have to do with them, and also live on them."

"I have nothing to do with these very good people. I keep only my own conscience."

"How do you know your conscience is right?"

"Conscience is a 'crowned truth,' armed from birth at every point."

"I do not think so. It has to be educated in a great many people. Else what good is there in our reformatories?"

"I don't know. Do you?"

"I know you are as impossible as ever. Suppose you go and see mother. She is so much changed."

"Do you mean that she is ill?"

"Go and see for yourself. I will wait here until you return. You had better speak to her about your marriage."

Steve nodded assent and went slowly upstairs to his mother's room. She had always seemed to live so near to heaven that Steve could anticipate no other change but that which would remove her to the land of her hopes and prayers. And dearly as he loved her, he knew that he had given her many, many hours of anxiety and sorrow. So he went with heavy heart and lingering steps to her presence. Her door was ajar, and he pushed it gently open. Mrs. Lloyd sat at a table facing him, surrounded by papers and busily writing. She had the air of a happy woman. She was handsomely dressed and looked much younger than her age warranted, for the cultivated, heavenly calm in which she had passed so many of the most vivid years of life, had preserved her youth and beauty.

As Steve entered she looked up quickly, and in that simple movement Steve recognized the great change that had taken place. Her face was alive with interest, her cheeks slightly flushed, her whole presence that of alert satisfaction. And as soon as she saw Steve another wondrous change appeared; a sudden transformation from the life of the intellect to the life of the heart. The intense love she had for her son was no longer pressed down and backward. It sprang into her eyes and illumined her countenance, it forced her to rise to her feet and outspread her arms, and Steve felt, even at the threshold, the warmth of her irrepressible attitude and cry:

"Steve! Steve! I was thinking of you a few moments ago. I was wishing you were here! And you come and answer my wish? Oh, you dear boy!"

The last words were said upon his lips when Steve had folded her to his heart and was laughing and crying in the same moment, and telling her she was the happiest mother a man ever had, and dearest, and the sweetest, asking between whiles "what have you been doing to yourself, mother? Whatever have you been doing?"

"I been doing something I want you to help me in, my own boy! Sit down at my side and let me tell you all about it."

She began with Max Lehman's visit, told him all, even something of that marvelous experience through the night her conviction, when she abandoned selfishness of caring only for her own salvation, and determined to give herself to others, and then trust God for her. She showed him the plans and the mates for the first duty she had assumed, and as she talked grew luminous and quiet over her hopes and intentions. In fact she quite enthused Steve. His heart beat to her heart; his face caught the light on her face; his tongue echoed all she said; they were clasping hands over the sacred bond and duty, and were not aware of it.

"Now, you must see what I want of Steve. Mr. Telford cannot give his whole time even though he gives his whole life to this work. I want you to act for me in business that I cannot well attend to, in places I do not care to visit. There are materials to contract for, and these must be examined—for we want the best—there are journeys to take, and people to see, and papers to authenticate, and papers to sign, and workmen to look at, and a score of other things to attend to that a woman has neither the prestige nor authority to profitably take in hand. You say you like work if it keeps you in the open air and permits you to walk about. This is your opportunity, Steve. Will you be my agent in this good work? Will you see to it that not a dollar of the money given for the benefit of my poor brothers and sisters is diverted from its right purpose?"

"Mother, I'll fight for every cent. I'll see that the builders keep every tithe of their obligations. I will take care that the masons do not put more sand than is in their mortar. The contractors shall do their full duty, the workmen shall do theirs. Send me whenever and wherever I wish on this work. I am with heart and soul."

"You make me exceedingly happy, Steve. When can you begin? To-morrow?"

"This very hour if you wish me to."

"What are you doing now?"

He hesitated a moment and answered: "I have been working for my wife the last few weeks. All since I was at sea."

"A wife!" A sudden coldness and chill that could be felt was in his voice. In fact both Steve's mother and sister experienced a quick sensation to the thought of him married.

They had urged him to entertain the idea, they had decided that marriage would be a good thing for him, but when the fact became fact, their first strong impulse was to repel it. It was a natural impulse. Steve understood the feeling of what was the outcome. He had been the idol, none the less so because he had escaped them endless anxieties and required frequent help. To give him up to another strange woman! To become second to one they had been first! No mother and sister ever loved thus fondly, and then to be requited without a sigh and a heartache.

Mrs. Lloyd, however, was not only conscientious, she was generous, and in a few minutes she recovered herself so completely that she was able to ask, with a smile:

"Who is the young lady, Steve?"

"It is Jessie."

"Jessie McAslin?"

"Yes, to be sure. I forgot there is to be some other Jessie. She is the one I told you about. I hope you like her, mother."

"She has many good qualities. Her brother is an exceptionally fine man."

"John is perfect. So is Jessie. I looked so brave and so happy as I heard the words, that it was impossible for me to restrain sympathy with him. Let his little jealousies slip away from his consciousness. She leaned forward, smiling, and said with tender enthusiasm:

"I am so glad you are going to marry Steve."

THE PLEDGE.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor
Topic for the Week Beginning
Mar. 14. II. Kings 1:3; 21-25.

IN what way the pledge can help the Endeavorer has often been questioned. It does not require of him anything more than it is his duty to do, and therefore it is simply nothing more than a solemn promise that Christ helping him, he will do his duty. Yet, as a matter of discipline, it has been found that it does help. The societies which dispensed with the pledge have not prospered, and those who adopted it, after working for a while without it, have realized the advantages to be derived from it. There is increased regularity of attendance and more thorough devotion to duty. Why? Chiefly because a definite and specific obligation has a power in the conscience and a sense of duty which no other has. It is sad to have to admit the fact, but it is so. We are not ready to be judged by "the law of the land." Left perfectly free, human nature yields to temptation, to circumstances, to environment, and does not always do its duty. So we have a law, voluntarily assume an obligation, which has the force of a law. The temperance movement avails itself of this excellent. A man avows himself a friend of temperance, all his sympathies are with the effort to get rid of the curse of the liquor habit. But we ask him to make the pledge. Then we know just what he stands. He binds himself to a gain, and so surrenders a part of his liberty. Without the pledge there are times when he might relax his high conception of duty and drink a glass of wine with a friend, but his pledge binds him; he is held by his specific promise, and cannot indulge without breaking it. So an oath is required of an officer. He fully intends to do all he pledges himself to do, but we require the pledge from him as a definite pledge that he will do these specified things. Even in the marriage relation, and in cases where the love on each side is so strong that each party is ready to do for love what is required, we ask for a definite and public pledge in the presence of witnesses, that the duties of husband and wife shall be faithfully performed. The pledge is in its essence an expedient, a corrective of the weakness of human nature. In a condition of higher development it would be superfluous. If human nature could be relied upon to do its duty unfalteringly and spontaneously, the pledge would not be of any utility. It could produce no better results than would be attained without it. But experience has proved that the better part of our nature is braced and strengthened by the pledge. It removes the necessity of decision in particular cases, and establishes a law which honor demands shall be obeyed. We need this compulsion as a help to our halting, wavering natures, but its necessity ought to be outgrown. As we lay commands upon a child and exact from him promises that he will do this or that, and abstain from doing other things, we look forward to the time when no such commands or promises will be necessary. We expect the time will come when, of his own accord and without any restrictive influence, he will do the things we wish him to do. So in the Christian life there should come a time when any such pledge as we now take will not be needed. The singing which was tied and forced to grow straight, shall be so strong that it cannot be forced to grow crooked. Its vigor is its growth that was forced upon it, and the props and cords, which were used in its earlier growth, may be removed. They have served their purpose. So the Christian Endeavor pledge should be outgrown when the very effects it has produced. If it becomes a habit, to a spontaneous performance of the duties recounted, its purpose will be effected and it may pass away. That is our ideal condition which sanctification holds out as an attainment to be continually sought. This is the glory of Christianity when, without law or pledge, the higher nature has established its rule so firmly that the lower nature yields without resistance and the Christian lives under the law of liberty.

NESTLING DOWN IN GOD'S WILL.

ONE word among the sweetest known,
O'er which I love to pause and rest,
Like lingering note of music soft,
Is learned from tender birdlings' nests.
So full of dear home peace, it seems
So restful in the trials of life.
The nest—the home—neath brooding love,
Safe shelter in earth's weary strife.
So dark the way, so hard the work,
Such strange, mysterious lessons given,
In life's hard school, I faltering turn
To rest in thoughts of God and heaven.
And there I long to find soul-peace,
To nestle down in God's sweet will,
To feel he knows, he cares for all,
His hand shall lead me safely still.
O, blessed is the holy time,
When God's own thoughts and mine are one,
When nestling down in his dear will,
Sweet comes the word, "I am his own!"
I give all up—the knowest best—
In darkest hours his light doth shine.
I nestle down in God's sweet will,
My soul at rest in love divine.
Oh, yearning heart! Oh, struggling soul!
How good on his sure Word to rest,
To nestle down in God's dear will,

To know, to feel his way is best.
I hear his voice amid earth's storms,
'Tis calm—the wind and tempest cease—
I nestle in his arms of love,
The Master walks with me in peace.
Berlin, Mass. —PHERE A. HOLDER.

"I WILL COME AGAIN"

COMING! Yes, he is coming!
What joy the prospect brings
To those who watch and daily wait
The glorious "King of kings!"
He may be here to-morrow,
Or before the sun has set;
Ere this day's task is folded up,
While this day's tears are wet!
He will gently take from my tired hands
The task he will complete,
And wipe from my eyes the teardrops
That fall on his pierced feet!
I know not the times or seasons
My God in his love doth keep.
But I know full well he is coming,
Whether I wake or sleep.
So "comfort ye one another"
With this his blessed Word
While we wait the glorious prospect "Forever with the Lord."

SIGNS OF THE END.

Events and Characteristics Denoting the Last Days of the Dispensation.

BY REV. TALBOT GREAVES.

NE great difficulty meets us on the very threshold of this most interesting subject—the actual period of time intended by the terms, "the last days," "the latter day," "the end of the days," "the more simple and solemn," "the end."

The Scriptures abound in predictions of the signs of this period, and it is only by a careful examination of the context that we can fix the exact period intended. We are prepared to expect that the predictions should be more or less descriptive of the whole period, so that there has never been a century since Christ came when students of prophecy have not seen the predicted signs of the close of the dispensation gathering around. For centuries there have been early developments of most of those features which we now regard as signs of the approaching end of the age, such as Romanism, Infidelity, and Lawlessness.

The number of predictions unfulfilled is becoming very small indeed, and this seeming exhaustion alike of prophecy and the resources of the future, proclaims most conclusively the nearness of the end. There are predictions which are now being fulfilled for the first time: such for instance as those which foretell the decay of the temporal power of the Papacy and Mohammedanism, the rapid diffusion of knowledge, the very methods of which are described in Daniel 12: 4; the extension of missions, the startling vividness with which Peter's prophecy classifies the peculiar features of modern scepticism, giving as its very argument the words, "Where is the sign?" arguments drawn from the stability of nature. Then notice the fulfilled prediction of the widespread defection from the truth among religious professors, and teaching so subtle that the Lord declares that if it were possible it should deceive the very elect. Such teaching is going on all around us, not in this communion and in that, but in every section of the visible church. While there is much ground in the character of the times in which we live for congratulation on changes which are for the better and not for the worse, while there is an unwise propensity to magnify the evils of the present and the benefits of the past, a deeper insight beneath the gilded surface discloses elements of action and mischief which may well create grave misgivings.

The shadows of coming peril are portentous and imminent. Eighteen centuries have passed since, looking forward from his days to the last days of the church, Paul gave the expressive warning that the times through which the church had to pass would be stormy and full of danger to faith, stability and comfort. "Know this," said the Apostle, and we must know. It is not enough to be assured of safety in Christ. We must know our position, duty, difficulties and prospects as to the church and the world, the dangers against which we are called to watch, the conflicts which lie before us, and like the tribe of Issachar we must understand the times and know what Israel ought to do.

[The events now taking place in South-eastern Europe have a special significance for the student of prophecy. The best expositors have long been agreed that at the close of this century the world would see the nations which occupy the area formerly constituting the Roman Empire confederated, and delegating their executive functions to one supreme head. Sceptics have told us that such a combination could never be made: national jealousies, antipathies and distrusts would always be too strong to admit of such united action. But what do we see? For many weeks past the six most powerful nations of Europe have been acting in unison on the very question most likely to set them quarreling. France and England, who in 1855 fought with Russia about the Eastern question, are now acting amicably with her, and have been joined by Germany, Austria and Italy. Evidently the critics were wrong: a European concert is possible.]

The Greco-Turkish War Cloud.

Great indignation has been excited among the people of England and France by the fact that the fleets of the allied powers, while in the port of Canea, bombarded the Cretan Christians while they were engaged in hostilities with a strong force of Turks on the heights back of the sea port itself. English warships led the shelling, and were followed by the German, French, Italian, and Spanish vessels. Seventy shells in all being fired. Within ten minutes after the bombardment opened the Cretans hauled down the flag and fighting ceased. It was not believed possible that the warships of civilized governments would be found so ready to force in support of Turkey and against a Christian people. The Greek army of invasion under Colonel Vassos occupies a large section of Crete, and is considered probable that the powers will ultimately make a compromise arrangement, granting autonomy to Crete, or placing the island under a Greek prince governor. Unless some conclusion is quickly reached, war between Greece and Turkey would seem inevitable.

Dr. Joseph to Visit Kurdistan.

Hannah G. Yoseph, the young Persian woman who lately finished a course of medical and missionary training in the United States, has safely reached Urumia, Persia. She will labor in her native land and in Kurdistan as a missionary medical worker under THE CHRISTIAN HERALD auspices, and in the course of her travels will visit that part of Asia which adjoins the Turkish, Russian and Persian borders, around Mount Ararat. The base of the "Mountain of the Delusion" are many small Nestorian villages, whose people very little has been known for centuries. They are Christians, however, and have held to their belief in a multitude of changes and while the terms of war and conquest have prevailed over their native land. Dr. Yoseph has sent to this journal letters relating her experiences among them, that will doubtless prove interesting to our readers. The letters will be illustrated with photographs. She will shortly visit Schua, the capital of Kurdistan.

SAPOLIO

A Musical Education Free.

Pratt's Chart of Chords for the Piano and Organ

It is a complete self-instructor, enabling any one to play the piano or organ at sight, and to play without difficulty brilliant accompaniments to any song ever written. It is valuable to the advanced musician as well as the beginner, embracing nearly every major and minor chord used in music, and is the nearest approach to a ready-made knowledge of music yet attained by science. It is a short cut to harmony, and is to music what the multiplication table is to arithmetic, a quick method of learning to play the Piano or Organ without a teacher. It is the practical result of years of study by CHAS. E. PRATT, the noted American composer and musician, and is the most comprehensive, yet simplest, chart ever published. Endorsed by teachers and musicians everywhere. Publisher's price, $1.00 each.

To introduce THE COLUMBIAN, Boston's great literary and family monthly, into new homes, we make the following liberal offer: A Three Months' trial subscription to THE COLUMBIAN, Pratt's Chart of Chords for the Piano and Organ and The Giant Album of Songs, containing 184 Songs with words and music.

All the above, postpaid, for 30 Cents. Stamps taken. Address, THE COLUMBIAN, 13, 15, 17 OTIS ST., BOSTON, MASS.

All the World's Best Literature in Thirty Volumes.

This is indeed an era of unread books. In this bustling, feverish age of ours few are the favored individuals who can lay claim to being "well read." The vast majority of educated people finish their "serious" reading just as they begin to be able really to appreciate the treasures bequeathed to us by the master minds of the past.

The Need of Condensation.

There are many, however, who honestly desire a large acquaintance with the great authors and books of the world, but the task is so enormous that a lifetime would seem too short to accomplish it.

The realization of this fact has produced a unique "Library of the World's Best Literature," the simple yet daring plan of which is to present, within the limits of 20,000 pages, the cream of the literature of all ages. The lines upon which this work has been carried out are as broad as literature itself. It offers the master productions of authors of all times, irrespective of the personal predilections or tastes of any one compiler or group of compilers. Although Charles Dudley Warner is the editor-in-chief, with Hamilton Wright Mabie, George H. Warner, and Lucia Gilbert Runkle as associates, the assistance has been sought of an advisory council, consisting of one eminent scholar from each of ten of our leading universities, thus insuring the widest possible breadth of literary appreciation.

A Few of the Famous Contributors.

The arrangement is not chronological, but alphabetical, thus diversifying the matter and avoiding the heavy monotony of ancient or mediæval literature. There are also elaborate articles upon all great authors, great books, and the literatures of different ages, nations, and periods, and these articles have been entrusted to over 300 of the foremost critics and writers of the United States, Great Britain, France, and Germany, and signed by such authorities as Dean Farrar, Andrew Lang, Mrs. Humphrey Ward, Dr. Andrew D. White, W. D. Howells, Henry James, and many other literary celebrities. These articles greatly increase the interest in the contents, and add a tremendous educational value by collecting for the student the most scholarly literary judgments of our own time.

Some Special Features.

One must search long before finding any similar combination of the scholarship of all lands called into harmonious and effective collaboration. The wide range of subjects is indescribable. The reader may compare the oratory with which Demosthenes stirred the souls of his fellow Athenians with those colossal utterances of our own Daniel Webster; the finest essays of Bacon with those of Emerson; the style of Herodotus with Macaulay; in wit and humor the best is to be found, while all that is vulgar or debasing has been eliminated. In that most popular form of literature—fiction—the choice of writers extends from those of ancient Egypt to Bunner, Kipling, Stevenson, and Bourget; while in poetry, it extends from Homer to such modern singers as Tennyson and Longfellow. In politics, letters, biography, sciences, and philosophy, theology and pulpit oratory, drama and the theatre, likewise, the names of the greatest exponents are to be found. There are, moreover, a host of legends, fables, antiquities, mythologies, folk-songs, and folk-lore.

More than a Thousand Illustrations.

The work is embellished with more than a thousand full-page and vignette portraits of authors, which enable the reader to obtain a perfect idea of the appearance of nearly the entire list of literary celebrities. The exceptional typographical beauty of the library, and the attractive bindings, will endear the edition to the most fastidious book-lover.

A Literary Education.

No one with any aspirations, to literary culture or taste can afford to be without this monumental compendium. In a word, if one reads at all, it is invaluable. With the aid of this great library which Mr. Warner and his able associates have so admirably wrought out, one may acquire in a season's easy reading a wider grasp of literature than could otherwise be obtained by the industrious study of a lifetime. Although this proposition may seem startling at first, these thirty volumes really contain a well-rounded literary education.

How to Secure this Great Work.

A limited number of sets is being distributed through the Harper's Weekly Club to introduce and advertise the library, these sets are at present supplied at less than one-half the regular price, and on easy monthly payments. Club now forming, will close this month, after which the price will be advanced.

The introductory sets available will be so quickly claimed that arrangements have been made with the club to reserve a limited number of sets for the special benefit of Christian Herald readers. Those who first apply, mentioning this journal, will secure them. Applications for special prices (and sample pages) should therefore be made at once to Harper's Weekly Club, 91 Fifth Avenue, New York.

A Prominent Physician Writes.
SPOTSWOOD, N. J., Aug. 3, 1896.
MESSRS. McKESON & ROBBINS:
Dear Sirs:—Please send me, by mail, four more bottles of Tartarilithine Tablets (100 each).
I will also here state, in justice, that this is the most welcome remedy that has come into my hands since my beginning of the practice of medicine. It has given me, in every case of rheumatism in which I have used it, the happiest kind of results. I have used discretion, perhaps even more than necessary, in its employment; that it be given to patients whom I believed required such a remedy or preparation; but these are just the kind that refuse to yield to ordinary treatment, old chronic cases of gouty diathesis, where there is a tendency to calcareous deposits, etc. These are undoubtedly, or have been, at least to me, the most troublesome patients in my practice to give what might fairly be termed good results. Now these have been the very kind in which I have been using Tartarilithine with the very happiest results to patients and myself. Many valuable remedies come daily to our aid, but this has been the most welcome one to me thus far.
Yours very truly,

Wounded and Paralyzed.

AN OLD VETERAN OF THE WAR AFTER YEARS OF SUFFERING HAS A SHOCK OF PARALYSIS.

From the Press, Utica, N. Y.

Mr. David G. Talbot is a well-known and respected citizen of Otsego County, New York, residing at Edmeston, who three years ago had an attack of paralysis, which he attributes to the effects of a wound received on the 16th of June, 1864, before Petersburg, Va., while serving with the New York Heavy Artillery.

The following is his own account of his illness and convalescence, which will be found interesting:

EDMESTON, N. Y., Aug. 31, 1896.
"On the fifth day of December, 1893, I was taken with a paralytic shock, which affected the whole of the left side, and I could not speak for three weeks. I was confined to my bed for a long time and constantly attended by a physician, though little relief was experienced. My stomach and the muscles of my throat were much affected. I was wounded in June, 1864, at Petersburg, Va., having then lost three fingers of my left hand, and that always affected me in a marked degree, my arm often becoming numb. I should state that on the day I received the stroke, I had two distinct shocks, the first in the morning, which was so light that the doctor was not at all alarmed, but the second nearly finished me up. Ever since the war I had suffered with nervous debility and my condition was very bad when I was attacked. I am now sixty years old and hardly dared look for anything approaching good health after my life of suffering, but I saw so much said about Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People in the newspapers, and that they were good for paralytics, that I determined to try them. This I did just one year and four months ago. I strictly followed directions and felt better within a week. I am not the same man I was when I began to take Dr. Williams' medicine. My old comrade Norton, who was in the same company and regiment with me, and was a grievous sufferer from general nervous debility, at my recommendation has taken Dr. Williams' Pink Pills and they have helped him wonderfully.

"I certify on honor that the above statement is true in every particular.

(Signed) DAVID G. TALBOT.
Witness JOHN C. LAPPEUS.

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills contain, in a condensed form, all the elements necessary to give new life and richness to the blood and restore shattered nerves. They are also a specific for troubles peculiar to females, such as suppressions, irregularities and all forms of weakness. They build up the blood, and restore the glow of health to pale and sallow cheeks. In men they effect a radical cure in all cases arising from mental worry, overwork or excesses of whatever nature. Pink Pills are sold in boxes (never in loose bulk) at 50 cents a box, or six boxes for $2.50, and may be had of all druggists or direct by mail from Dr. Williams' Medicine Company, Schenectady, N. Y.

THE MAN who has charge of our Seed Storage Warehouses in Jersey City has just reported that he finds he has on hand several bushels of "1897" Pea, previously overlooked. This enables us to repeat below our large advertisement, which originally appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of February 17th.
PETER HENDERSON & CO., 35 and 37 Cortlandt St., New York.

The Great Garden Pea of the year
HENDERSON'S "1897"

We are Anxious for a Name
Worthy of this SUPERB NEW PEA (THE "1897")
And will Pay for it in Cash $200.00

Because we are certain that the "1897" will attain, among garden Peas, the highest possible rank, we have decided to offer a prize of $200.00 for the name sent in this year that we shall consider the most appropriate for the variety. Purchasers of the Pea who intend to suggest a name should read CONDITIONS OF COMPETITION. Every package of "1897" Pea contains a coupon with blank space for name suggested, also for competitor's name and address, so that all purchasers of the Pea are entitled to fill out just as many coupons as their order calls for packages. Coupons may be returned to us any time throughout the season, but not later than October 1, 1897. The prize money to be remitted by us during December, 1897.

DESCRIPTION OF HENDERSON'S NEW "1897" PEA
The ideal garden Pea should combine extreme earliness, quantity and quality. We have long had many varieties that possessed one, and often two, of these most essential characteristics, but until the advent of our "1897" none that possessed all three, and, what is more wonderful still, that it should have all these features in the superlative degree. We have grown it in our Trial Grounds for the last two seasons, and find in earliness and yield it leaves nothing to be desired, while its delicious flavor is such that that epicure would indeed be hard to please whom it failed to satisfy. Our Catalogue, offered below, describes it in more extended detail.
Henderson's "1897" Pea will be delivered free to any Post-Office in the United States, at following prices (when more convenient buyers may remit in stamps), 20 cents per package; 3 packages for 50 cents; 7 packages for $1.00. (Every package containing a coupon as stated above.)

NOW THEN about "JUBILEE" CATALOGUE which we will send FREE
With every order from this advertisement. Every copy of our "Jubilee" Catalogue of "Everything for the Garden" costs 25 cents to produce, but with every order from this advertisement for "1897" Pea we will send a copy without charge. Prepared to commemorate the fiftieth anniversary of our business, scores among the thousands who have already seen it have told us that it is the most beautiful and interesting Seed and Plant Catalogue ever issued. It is a magnificent work of 170 pages, on which are displayed over 500 illustrations of the principal products of our Gardens and Greenhouses. Also 6 full-sized colored plates, which in artistic beauty have probably never been equaled. Certainly, FINALLY to send our "Jubilee Surprise Souvenir" without charge to all who, in ordering from this advertisement, will state they saw it in this publication.

Full Size—Five Octaves—Double Reed Action—122 Reeds—10 Stops—15 Combinations.

This Photo-Engraving beautifully pictures and accurately describes one of the handsomest Cabinet Reed Organs ever invented by us. We guarantee it to be exactly as represented in every detail; in fact, in spite of the greatest pains taken to faithfully reproduce the actual photograph, the picture fails to do the instrument justice. It is far better even than it looks.

We are anxious to offer our respected patrons and friends the best possible organ at the least possible price. We wish to bring a really first-class, elegant-looking instrument within the reach of all and the "SILVER CHIME" is the result. We expect to sell Two Thousand during the run of this special offer, and already we are building them as rapidly as possible to meet the rush that is sure to come for all our bargains this is the best. For a limited period only we offer this beautiful instrument for the very small sum of $35.00 (Thirty-five Dollars), provided you send us all cash with your order. Now, this is the best value for the money we have ever offered, and no agent or dealer could possibly sell you such an organ for twice as much money. Remember, also, that we are the only firm of actual makers of pianos and organs who sell exclusively to the public at first cost, and that it is practically impossible for you to buy upon the terms and prices we sell at from ANY OTHER FIRM ON EARTH.

Of course we will sell this beautiful Organ on any other terms to suit the convenience of those who cannot pay all cash. We will consider any special offer you may make us. Some people only have ready money a few times every year, but we can arrange to take notes, with reasonable interest, and, in fact will do anything reasonably possible to secure your patronage. A detailed description of this beautiful organ will be sent on application.

Money Talks! Better send Cash with your Order for whichever instrument you decide to purchase. Our now famous "CASH-WITH-ORDER" system is entirely for your benefit. We get a better price if you purchase on any other plan of payment. Your pocket is richer, as you get the benefit of a handsome cash discount, and as for taking any risk in sending money in advance, you know our motto is to all: "No satisfaction, no pay." Your money and the forward freight charges will be immediately refunded if the instrument sent you is not entirely satisfactory and as represented, after 30 days' trial in your own home. You take no risk; we have plant and property, and hard cash, to the extent of over ONE MILLION DOLLARS to back up our contracts. Our bargains are fair and honest, and we shall do exactly as we say.

NOTE.—We can supply this organ in low top case, elegantly finished both front and back, suitable for church, school or lodge, at the same price.

Questions and Answers.

Reader, Canfield, O. I wish you would state in your paper what per cent. of contributions reaches the destination of the different charities. I find a good many think it very small. I am inclined to think what passes through your hands is all sent.

Every dollar sent to us for India, Armenia or other benevolences abroad, reaches its destination intact, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD paying all expenses incident to the handling and transmission of such funds.

A. H. K., Melroy, Pa. 1. Where in the Bible can I find the words: "Truth crushed to earth shall rise again?" 2. Who answers the questions in THE MAIL-BAG?

1. It is not in the Bible, but is a quotation from one of William Cullen Bryant's poems. 2. The editors.

M. B. C., Du Bois, Pa. Do you think it wrong for a Christian to engage in labor which prevents his attending public worship on Sabbath morning or afternoon?

It would be wrong to continue in employment which debarred him from all except evening service, if he could make a change. Such a condition need only be borne until an opportunity for a better arrangement offers. For the time being it is "a work of necessity."

F. H. S., Clio, Tex. I have thought a great deal about the evangelization of the world. Do you not think it would be possible to wake Christian people up to their responsibility and opportunity to christianize the world, and in the year 1900 to have a jubilee year and self-denial year, and give $5 each for missions, and send 10,000 missionaries to the great mission fields, Africa, China and India, and 10,000 to other points?

The idea of signaling the opening of the new century in some way that shall mark a great forward movement in Christian work is one that has been repeatedly suggested, and it is not improbable that it may yet take some definite form.

M. A. A., Cherryvale, Kan. If the International Arbitration Treaty, now before the Senate, which you earnestly desire your readers to favor with our influence, is such a good thing, why not petition that honorable body to change it so as to cover a longer period?

The Treaty is "a good thing" in the highest sense, since it makes for peace and amity among the nations. No Christian can afford to dash aside the olive branch and grasp the sword, which he does if he opposes the arbitration principle. The present outlook for the Treaty is not encouraging; the politicians seem to have practically eviscerated it and rendered it meaningless. With respect to extending the period of the Treaty, that need not now be discussed, the main purpose being at present to get a treaty at all.

If it is not wrong to wear jewelry, what do the following passages mean?—1. Peter 3:3; 1. Timothy 2:9; 1. John 2:15-17; Isaiah 3:16-24; Isaiah 55:2; 1. Corinthians 6:19-20? If people would honestly study God's Word and think of the starving millions in India, and the needy ones in Armenia, and other places, they would certainly stop gratifying pride by spending money for jewelry, and send it to help the needy. How much would be set aside for charity if all Christians would stop following the fashions and dress in modest apparel?

Deborah, J. F., Wawaset, Pa. A daughter desires to join the church against the will of her parents, and returns to ask her mother, who will not agree in any way to her choice. The daughter has been reared and brought up to their profession. What is her duty in the matter?

Her first duty—and the duty of every one—is to God and her own conscience. If we are to be true to Christ we must be prepared to sacrifice all other ties and affections for his sake. See Matt. 19:29.

P. A. I., Madison. Do you think it is possible to live a sin-thrilled life here, overcoming all temptations and being exempt from all sin?

That is the ideal which we are encouraged to strive after. "Be ye therefore perfect, as your Father in heaven is perfect" (Matt. 5:48). It is not to be obtained by any occult means, but we are assured that to every one who earnestly seeks to attain it, the Holy Spirit is given to work with him and help him. No one should expect a miracle to be performed upon him, and wait idly for it, making no effort for his own deliverance, but relying on the help promised him should diligently try to live like

Christ, getting rid of all conceit, pride, uncharitable feelings from his heart, and watching for opportunities of rendering service to those about him. In that way he may prove for himself whether it is possible to live a sanctified life. The nearer he comes to the ideal the better it will be for himself and all with whom he has to do.

A minister of Los Angeles, Cal., says: I am over eighty years old and unable to earn anything, but I had rather scrimp myself than miss sending my mite to those poor sufferers in India.

S. L. H. Is it right for a Christian to take more than the bare necessities of life? Can such a one indulge in the pleasures and luxuries of life such as comfortable surroundings, books, travel, and innocent recreations, assuming of course that he devotes a portion of his means to Christ's work?

It is perfectly right that one should enjoy all the good things of life in moderation, always keeping in view what is due from himself to others, and the duty of helping those who are in need; but indulgence in luxuries, extravagance in any form, and all pleasures that are other than innocent, educative, recreative, and healthful, are to be avoided.

THE LARGEST GRAPE-VINE IN THE WORLD.

This mammoth vine is near Santa Barbara, California, in the heart of the great grape-growing district. All the shoots, or tendrils, come from the same plant. It is said to be a magnificent sight when in full bearing, with its rich clusters of luscious, tempting fruit and its profusion of cool, green leaves.

There is nothing to be gained by living the life of an ascetic or a misanthrope. The Almighty gives us life to make the best of it we can and, it is better to walk in the brightness of the sunshine than in the gloom. One who diffuses sunshine and happiness is more likely to be serviceable in the upbuilding of the Kingdom of Righteousness, than one who takes existence here as a penance.

Peter K., Lucknow. Do you think it is possible to foretell the future by the tea-cup as some claim they do? Do you think it right for a person who professes to be a Christian to claim that they can do this?

This custom, which still remains among the ignorant and superstitious, is a relic of the arts of divination and sorcery. It is absurd to imagine that anyone can foretell the future by such means, and only the very credulous and superstitious can be imposed upon by such clumsy charlatanism. No Christian will give heed to these practices, being satisfied to leave the future in the hands of an all-wise Father.

Widow, New Castle, Pa. Will a person be held accountable in the next world for leaving undone things she now sees she might have done for the salvation of another, which did not come into her mind until it was too late?

God is very merciful, and we have no conception how far his mercy will extend to persons who are sincerely sorry for having neglected opportunities of usefulness. Remorse should not be indulged except so far as it leads to amendment. Grief over missed opportunities should stir us up to vigilance, and a determination that in the future no opportunity shall escape us. That is a better use of it than unavailing grief, which unfits us for present duties. Such atonement God will surely accept.

A. S. J., Red Bank, N. J. If, as you say, God does not convert a person against his will, I should like to know how Paul was converted?

He explicitly says: "I was not disobedient with the heavenly vision" (Acts 26:19), which shows that he was not converted against his will. The sudden discovery that he was engaged in persecuting a divine Being was quite sufficient to change his mind and alter his course. If a man finds that the road he is taking does not lead to his destination, in fact is the wrong road, he turns about; but the change is not against his will. That was the discovery Paul made.

Reader, Superior, Wis. 1. Do you think it right for Christians to read infidel books, such as those written by Col. Ingersoll? 2. Has Dr. Talmage written a reply to them?

1. We think it unwise to read them. They deal flippantly with sacred things, and they argue plausibly against Christianity. Scholars and skilled logicians are not imposed on by their sophistry, but persons unaccustomed to weigh arguments are liable to be disturbed by the assaults on the Bible, and to attach more weight to them than they deserve. 2. Dr. Talmage preached a series of sermons in 1882 in reply to Col. Ingersoll.

Reader, Thomastown, O. 1. Does God send trouble? Did God send the trouble to Job? 2. In what way have all sinned and "come short of the glory of God"? 3. Is the Holy Ghost given by the laying on of hands as described in Acts 8:17?

1. Our troubles usually come through our mistakes and sins, or those of others. It is possible that some may come as a means of purification and sanctification. Many Christians have learned lessons in the school of affliction they would have learned nowhere relief to find it there. We think Universalists do not deny the divinity of Christ. It is Unitarians who do that.

Alvin T. Ludwig, Allentown, Pa. In the Mail of Feb. 17, you say that Mary and Joseph married before the birth of Christ. My criticism is that is not the case. The Bible says they were espoused—that means engaged to be married. They were not married until after Christ was born.

We do not think your criticism is born by the Gospel (Matt. 1:18-25). The plain meaning as it seems to us is that they were engaged or espoused, and Joseph thinking Mary had not been virtuous, was about to break the engagement. The angel's explanation satisfied him and he obeyed the advice: "Fear not to take unto thee Mary thy wife." That is to marry her as you agreed. "Then Joseph did as the angel bidden him and took unto him his wife."

D. P. G., Kimberton, Pa. 1. Has a congregation a legal right to hold an election of officers Sunday, when their constitution says it shall be held on Saturday? 2. Has a pastor the (at his own discretion) to change the number of members of a church council from seven, when the constitution says there shall be nine?

1. This question has lately been decided adversely by a New York court, even when the constitution of a society specified Sunday day of annual election. The judge held the Sabbath should be protected from desecration of transacting such business that day. 2. He has no right to change or misinterpret the constitution or to act in violation thereof.

S. M. R., Philadelphia, Pa. If a person who really converted joins a church merely to please others, can he hope for forgiveness for his sin if he repents?

Yes, we are clearly assured that the blessed Jesus Christ cleanses from all sin. The man is in his resting satisfied with his church membership, and not satisfied to be really born again. The some eminent ministers (Mr. J. was one), who not only joined the Church without being converted, but preached for years without knowing the power of the Gospel, who frequently found forgiveness and used of God in the conversions of others.

W. C. M., Daisy, Ga. Why did Jesus propose to scourge Jesus after finding that he found no fault in him?

It was the effort of a weak man to effect a compromise. The Jews wanted crucifixion, but Pilate proposed scourging. He did not want to endorse the sentence of death, therefore proposed scourging, consistent as it was, as the less terrible evils. The Jews had him in their power and he knew it.

F. D. C., San Antonio, Tex. Did the Apostle Paul ever marry?

There is no reason for thinking that he was. The natural inference from his remarks about women and marriage is that he was a bachelor (1. Cor. 7:8, 26, 27). He did not favorably on marriage on account of the social conditions in which Christians were placed at that time. His remark (1. Cor. 7:9), that marriage was not so bad as burning, seems to show that he had been married, but others have regarded the passage as proving that he could not have been married. There is no actual proof one way or the other, but taking all his references to the subject together, the balance of probability is in his being married.

else. Whether God sends them, or merely permits them to come is not so much a question of importance as whether we learn the lessons from them they are capable of teaching. As to Job, there was an idea current that troubles were a punishment for sin. The author of the book undertook to show that there might be another explanation of them. 2. Men do not realize the life that is possible for them. They have fallen short of the glory they might attain, and the reason is that they have crippled themselves by sin. 3. J. L. S., West Chesterfield, N. H. What are the doctrines of Universalism? I know that the Universalists do not believe in the divinity of Christ, but what other differences are there?

The distinguishing doctrine of Universalism is that eventually all men will be saved. That God will not be defeated in his purposes. That having by his Providential dealings sought to draw men to himself in this life, he will use sharper measures after death with those who die impenitent and, when they are brought to repentance will receive them into heaven. That in the end there will be no knee in the universe that will not bow to Christ, nor any tongue that will not call him Lord. Or orthodox Christians can find no basis in the Bible for the hope, though it would be a great

ALL eyes are turned toward Washington, where the new Administration last week assumed the control of the public affairs of our Nation. This peaceful quinquennial transfer of authority, which is accomplished without the slightest friction and amid the utmost cordiality on all sides, is an object-lesson in republican government for the whole world. At the Inauguration, the National Capital was the scene of one of the grandest and most imposing pageants witnessed there in many years. The retiring President and President-elect, the retiring and the new Vice-President, the members of Mr. Cleveland's Cabinet and the gentlemen chosen to compose the Cabinet of President McKinley, reached the Capitol shortly before noon on March 4. They were escorted from the White House by the Inaugural procession. On arriving in the Senate Chamber—where the members of the Supreme Court, Senators and House had gathered—Vice-President Stevenson administered the oath of office to Vice-President Hobart, and at the same time, the Senate of the Fifty-fourth Congress was declared adjourned. An extra session of the Senate having been called, the new Vice-President administered the oath of office to the newly-elected Senators, and the Senate took a recess. The Inaugural procession then moved to a stand at the east portico, in front of the Rotunda, the retiring President and President-elect leading. On reaching the stand the oath of office was administered to the President-elect by the Chief-Justice, after which the President delivered the usual Inaugural address. He was then escorted to the White House, from a stand in front of which he reviewed the splendid parade, a pageant unequalled in the history of inaugurations. Of course, the ladies of the Presidential party and many others, including the wives and daughters of Cabinet members, Senators, Representatives, naval and military officers, Ambassadors and representatives of foreign governments, and other dignitaries, made a brilliant showing at the ceremonies. The President-elect's party, which came from Canton, Ohio, included the following: Mrs. McKinley, Mrs. McKinley, (mother of the President-elect); Miss Helen McKinley and Mr. James McKinley, sister and grandson; Mr. and Mrs. A. J. Dunn, their son, Mr. William McKinley, nephew, and daughter, Miss Sarah Dunn; Mr. and Mrs. Barber, Mr. and Mrs. L. Bowman, Mr. and Mrs. McWilliams, Chicago; Mr. and Mrs. George Morse, San Francisco; Mr. and Mrs. Marcus Anna, Colonel and Mrs. Myron T. Herk, Judge and Mrs. Miller, of Canton; Captain and Mrs. Heistand and Mr. Mes Boyle, Miss Mary Barber and Miss Grace McKinley. While all the ladies wore handsome dresses at the ceremonies, there was an absence of fulsome or extravagant display. Mrs. McKinley's own tastes are simple and rather quiet. "Mother" McKinley wore a very becoming black satin gown and a white lace cape, and with her dear, old, good natured face, she was one of the most picturesque personalities present. In the evening the Inaugural Ball was held in the great hall of the Pension Building, which was beautifully decorated for the occasion. It was a most brilliant gathering—a dignified and courtly function, at which the new and the old administrations mingled together in the pleasant interchange of sociable courtesies. It is said that the floral and electric decorations alone cost over $12,000. Great masses of the rarest and most fragrant blooms were used, and the display of roses, plumosa wreaths, acacia and azalea plants, jonquils, tulips, Alabama smilax, tropical plants, festoons of laurel, orchids, sabal palms and palm crowns, was something truly marvelous. The entire arrangements for the induction of the new Administration into office were entrusted to the care of a number of committees, all operating under an Executive Committee, the chairman of which was Mr. Charles J. Bell, of Washington. There were Sub-committees on Reception, Finance, Banquet, Transportation, Press, Arrangements, Civic Organizations, Music,

THE NEW ADMINISTRATION INAUGURATED.

Invitations, Military Organizations, Decorations, Illuminations, etc. A generous sum was contributed by friends to help bear the expense of the magnificent display, and though everything was managed on a grand scale, no money was wasted.

Unquestionably the great event of the day, upon which popular interest centred, was the parade. It consisted of two branches—military and civic, the former including United States troops, (infantry, cavalry and artillery), National Guards of various states and cadet regiments, and the latter comprising various clubs and associations. The line of march was down in public affairs. Senator Sherman is so well known that it is unnecessary at this time to recall the events of his long public career. Mr. Gage is one of the foremost of our great bankers, and a leading citizen of Chicago. He is a Christian gentleman of New England ancestry, and the son of a farmer. His whole career has been that of an earnest, active, conscientious man of affairs, who from a comparatively humble beginning has risen to his present deserved eminence. At eighteen years of age he was office-boy and junior clerk in a bank at Rome, N. Y., at $100 a year. He did laborer's work in a marked talent, and a fitting successor to the place formerly filled by such notable men as Col. John Hay, Major Elijah Halford, and Hon. Daniel Lamont, who rose to a Cabinet portfolio.

SOUL AND BODY.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning Mar. 21: "How the body Influences the Soul." Daniel 1: 8-21.

HOW close is the relation between body and soul, everyone knows who has observed himself. Apart from the sins of the body which corrupt and debase the soul, there is a distinct connection between physical self-indulgence in innocent gratification and spiritual deterioration. The effect of a heavy dinner on a man who is going to church, to prayer meeting, or to Sunday School, is to dull the finer spiritual sensitiveness and make him lethargic and obtuse. His perceptions are temporarily blunted and his devotions weighted. A long course of self-indulgence benumbs the soul and paralyzes its capacity for communion with God. Consciousness of the fact has led to fasting and other forms of self-mortification. The old monks who chastised each other with whips and wore irritating garments next to the skin had in the earlier times a substantial motive in their penances, until they began to be regarded as meritorious and as having a virtue in themselves. Then they became useless and mischievous. So soon as a man was disturbed and distressed by the physical pain which resulted from his self-discipline, he began to lose spiritual power. His attention was diverted from spiritual to physical things, as surely as it would have been diverted by self-indulgence. Spiritual growth and development are the supreme objects of our lives and this fact ought to guide us in the treatment of the body. If we can reach the soul by our discipline of the body we are right in using the means, but the means should never become an end in themselves. There is no merit in fasting, nor in abstinence from pleasant and agreeable things, but if by either means the soul is invigorated, there is a distinct advantage in practising them. It should be clearly kept in mind that only as they serve the great spiritual purpose are they of any value.

Another aspect of the subject is the importance of self-denial in the maintenance of physical subordination. The soul should rule in the body. There is nothing more despicable than the condition in which a man is who becomes a slave to his physical appetites and passions. When he yields to the clamoring of the demands of the body in any matter after determining to resist, he is in a state of anarchy which is ruinous. The insistence on obedience to the higher power is a discipline essential to that man's welfare which he cannot afford to ignore. The Apostle Paul's boast that he brought his body into subjection is one that every Christian ought to be able to make. If he finds himself restless or uncomfortable without some indulgence, he has clear indication of the place at which self-government should be tested. The body will get its own way if it can; it calls habit to its aid; it has innumerable ways of pressing its demands, but the more persistent it is, the more need there is of rigorous suppression. It should be taught that the soul is the ruling power within the man and that mutiny will not be tolerated. In no other way can the man rise above his animal nature and be truly a man. Of the grosser forms of self-indulgence, drunkenness and licentiousness, it is not necessary to speak to Christian Endeavorers.

FESTIVITY.

A Sermon by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., Bring hither the fatted calf on the Text: Luke 15: 23: . . . and kill it.

IN all ages of the world it has been customary to celebrate joyful events by festivity. The signing of treaties, the proclamation of peace, the inauguration of presidents, the coronation of kings, the Christmas, the marriage. However much on other days of the year our table may have stinted supply, on Thanksgiving Day there must be something bounteous. And all the comfortable homes of Christendom have at some time celebrated joyful events by banquet and festivity. Something has happened on the old homestead greater than anything that has ever happened before. A favorite son whom the world supposed would become a vagabond and outlaw forever has got tired of sight-seeing and has returned to his father's house. The world said he never would come back. The old man always said his son would come back. He had been looking for him day after day and year after year. He knew he would come back. Now having returned to his father's house the father proclaims celebration. There is in the paddock a calf that has been kept up and fed to utmost capacity, so as to be ready for some occasion of joy that might come along. Ah! there never would be a grander day on the old homestead than this day. Let the butchers do their work, and the housekeepers bring in to the table the smoking meat. The musicians will take their places, and the gay groups will move up and down the floor. All the friends and neighbors are gathered in and an extra supply is sent out to the table of the servants. The father presides at the table and says grace, and thanks God that his long-absent boy is home again. Oh! how they missed him, how glad they are to have him back.

One brother stands pouting at the back door and says, "This is a great ado about nothing; this bad boy should have been chastised instead of greeted; veal is too good for him!" But the father says, "Nothing is too good, nothing is good enough." There sits the young man, glad at the hearty reception, but a shadow of sorrow flitting across his brow at the remembrance of the trouble he had seen. All ready now. Let the covers lift. Music. He was dead and he is alive again! He was lost and he is found! By such bold imagery does the Bible set forth the merry-making when a soul comes home to God.

First of all, there is the new convert's joy. It is no tame thing to become a Christian. The most tremendous moment in a man's life is when he surrenders himself to God. The grandest time on the father's homestead is when the boy comes back. Among the great throng who in the parlors of our church professed Christ one night was a young man who next morning rang my door bell and said, "Sir, I cannot contain myself with the joy I feel. I came here this morning to express it. I have found more joy in five minutes in serving God than in all the years of my prodigality, and I come to say so." You have seen perhaps a man running for his temporal liberty and for others of the law enter into it, and you saw him escape, or afterward you hear the judge had pardoned him, and how great was the glee of that released man, but it is a very tame thing that compared with the running for one's everlasting life, the terrors of the law after him, and Christ coming in to pardon and bless and rescue and save.

You remember John Bunyan in his great story tells how the pilgrim put his fingers to his ears, and ran, crying: "Life, life, eternal life!" A poor car-driver some time ago, after years having had to struggle to support his family, suddenly was informed that a large inheritance was his, and there was a joy amounting to bewilderment; but that is a small thing compared with the experience of one when he has put in his hands the title-deed to the joys, the raptures, the splendors of heaven, and he can truly say, "Its mansions are mine, its temples are mine, its songs are mine, its God is mine!" Oh, it is no tame thing to be come a Christian. It is a merry-making. It is the killing of the fatted calf. It is a jubilee. You know the Bible never compares it to a funeral, but always compares it to something delightful. It is more apt to be compared to a banquet than anything else. Oh, the joy of the new convert. Oh, the gladness of the Christian service. You have seen sometimes a man in a religious assembly get up and give his experience. Well, Paul gave his experience. He arose in the presence of two Churches, the Church on earth and the Church in heaven, and he said: "Now this is my experience; sorrowful yet always rejoicing—poor, yet making many rich—having nothing, yet possessing all things." Oh, the joys of this Christian religion. Just pass over from those tame joys in which you are indulging, joys of this world, into the raptures of the gospel. The world cannot satisfy you; you have found that out. Alexander longing for other worlds to conquer, and yet drowned in his own bottle; Byron whipped by disquietudes around the world; Voltaire cursing his own soul while all the streets of Paris were applauding him; Henry VIII. consuming with hatred against poor Thomas a Becket—all illustrations of the fact that this world cannot make a man happy. The very man who poisoned the pommel of the saddle on which Queen Elizabeth rode shouted in the street, "God save the Queen!" One moment the world applauds, and the next moment the world anathematizes. Oh, come over into this greater joy, this sublime solace, this magnificent beatitude. The night after the battle of Shiloh, and there were thousands of wounded on the field, and the ambulances had not come, one Christian soldier lying there a-dying under the starlight, began to sing:

There is a land of pure delight,
And when he came to the next line there were scores of voices singing:

Where saints immortal reign,
The song was caught up all through the fields among the wounded until it was said there were at least 10,000 wounded men uniting their voices as they came to the verse:

There everlasting Spring abides
And never withering flowers;
'Tis but a narrow stream divides
This heavenly land from ours.

Oh, it is a great religion to live by, and a great religion to die by. There is only one heart-throb between you and that religion. Just look into the face of your pardoning God and surrender yourself for time and for eternity, and he is yours, and heaven is yours, and all is yours. Some of you, like the young man of the text, have gone far astray. I know not the history, but you know it, you know it. When a young man went forth into life, the legend says, his guardian angel went forth with him, and getting him into a field, the guardian angel swept a circle clear around where the young man stood. It was a circle of virtue and honor, and he must not step beyond that circle. Armed foes came down, but were obliged to halt at the circle. They could not pass. But one day a temptress, with diamonded hand, stretched forth and crossed that circle with the hand, and the tempted soul took it, and by that one fell grip was brought beyond the circle and died. Some of you have stepped beyond that circle. Would you not like this day, by the grace of God to step back? This, I say to you, is your hour of salvation. There was in the closing hours of Queen Anne what is called the clock scene. Flat down on the pillow in helpless sickness, she could not move her head or move her hand. She was waiting for the hour when the ministers of state should gather in angry contest, and worried and worn out by the coming hour, and in momentary absence of the nurse, in the power, the strange power which delirium sometimes gives one, she arose and stood in front of the clock, and stood there watching the clock when the nurse returned. The nurse said, "Do you see anything peculiar about that clock?" She made no answer, but soon died. There is a clock scene in every history. If some of you would rise from the bed of lethargy and come out from your delirium of sin and look on the clock of your destiny this moment, you would see and hear something you have not seen or heard before, and every tick of the minute, and every stroke of the hour, and every swing of the pendulum, would say, "Now, now, now!" Oh, come home to your Father's house. Come home, oh, prodigal, from the wilderness. Come home, come home!

But I notice that when the prodigal came there was the father's joy. He did not greet him with any formal "How do you do?" He did not come out and say, "You are unfit to enter; go and wash in the trough by the well, and then you can come in; we have had enough trouble with you." Ah, no! When the proprietor of that estate proclaimed festival, it was an outburst of a father's love and a father's joy. God is your Father. I have not much sympathy with the description of God I sometimes hear, as though he were a Turkish Sultan, hard and unsympathetic, and listening not to the cry of his subjects. A man told me he saw in one of the Eastern lands a king riding along, and two men were in altercation, and one charged the other with having eaten his rice, and the king said: "Then slay the man, and by post-mortem examination find whether he has eaten the rice." And he was slain. Ah! the cruelty of a scene like that. Our God is not a Sultan, not a despot, but a Father—kind, loving, forgiving, and he makes all heaven ring again when a prodigal comes back. "I have no pleasure," he says, "in the death of him that dieth." All may be saved. If a man does not get to heaven, it is because he will not go there. No difference the color, no difference the history, no difference the antecedents, no difference the surroundings, no difference the sin. You remember reading the story of a king, who on some great day of festivity scattered silver and gold among the people, who sent valuable presents to his courtiers; but methinks, when a soul comes back, God is so glad that to express his joy he flings out new worlds into space, and kindles up new suns, and rolls among the white-robed anthems of the redeemed a greater hallelujah, while with a voice that reverberates among the mountains of frankincense and is echoed back from the everlasting gates he cries: "This, my son, was dead and is alive again!"

At the opening of the Exposition in Orleans I saw a Mexican flutist, and he played the solo, and then afterward eight or ten bands of music, accompanied by the great organ, came in; but the solo of that one flute as compared with all the orchestras was greater than all the combined joy of the universe when compared with the resounding heart of Almighty God. For ten years a father went times a day to the depot. His son was off in aggravating circumstances, but the father said: "He will come back." The strain was too much and his mind passed, and three times a day the father went the early morning he watched the train, its arrival, the stepping out of the passengers, and then the departure of the train. At noon he was there again watching the advance of the train, watching the departure. At night he was there watching the coming, watching the going for ten years. He was sure his son would come back. God has been watching waiting for some of you, my brothers, years, twenty years, thirty years, years, perhaps fifty years, waiting, watching, watching, and if now the prodigal should come home, what a scene of gladness and festivity, and how the Father's heart would rejoice at your coming home. You will come, some of you, will you not? You will, you will.

I notice also, that when a prodigal comes home there is the joy of the sisters of religion. Oh, it is a grand thing to preach this Gospel. I know there has been a great deal said about the trials and hardships of the Christian ministry. I wish somebody would write a rousing book about the joys of the Christian ministry. Since I entered the profession, I have seen more of the goodness of God than I will be able to celebrate for eternity. I know some boast about equilibrium, and they do not rise in enthusiasm, and they do not break forth with emotion; but I confess to you that when I see a man coming to God giving up his sin I feel in body, mind and soul a transport. When I see a bound hand and foot in evil habit emancipated, I rejoice over it as though it were my own emancipation.

When in one communion service I see throngs of young and old stood up in the presence of heaven and earth and he attested their allegiance to Jesus Christ, I felt a joy something akin to that which the apostle describes when he says, "Whether in the body I cannot tell, of the body I cannot tell; God knows. Oh, have not ministers a right to rejoice when a prodigal comes home? The trumpet, and ought they not to be glad of the gathering of the host? They praise to the full supply, and ought they to rejoice when thirsty souls plunge into the baptism for the water brooks? They answer forth, saying: "All things are now accomplished—ought they not to rejoice when the prodigal sits down at the banquet? Insurance men will all tell you that mine of religion, as a class, live longer than any other. It is the statistics of all those who calculate upon human longevity that ministers of religion, as a class, live longer than any other. Why is it? The more draft upon the nervous system in any other profession, and their life most exhausting. I have seen ministers kept on miserable stipends by pious congregations who wondered at the dullness of the sermon when the minister was God were perplexed almost to death by questions of livelihood and had not a nutritious food to keep any fire in the temperament. No fuel, no fire. I have sometimes seen the inside of the feeble many of the American clergymen accepting their hospitality because they cannot afford it; but I have seen the struggle on with salaries of five or six hundred dollars a year—the average of them—that their struggle well depicted the Western missionary, who says in his letter: "Thank you for the last remittance until it came we had not any meat."

base for one year, and all last Winter, although it was a severe Winter, our children wore their Summer clothes." And the men of God I find in different parts of the land struggling against annoyance and exasperations innumerable: some of them week after week entertaining agents who have maps or lightning-rods to sell, and submitting themselves to all styles of annoyance, and yet without complaint and cheerful of soul. How do you account for the fact that these life insurance men, as ministers, as a class, live longer than any other? It is because of the joy of their work; the joy of the harvest-field, the joy of greeting prodigals home to their Father's house.

Notice also when the prodigal comes back all earnest Christians rejoice. If I stood on Montauk Point, and there was a hurricane at sea and it was blowing toward the shore, and a vessel crashed to the rocks, and you saw people get more in the lifeboats, and the very last one got on the rocks in safety, you could not control your joy. And it is a glad time when the Church of God sees men who, tossed on the ocean of their sins plant their feet on the rock Christ Jesus. Oh, when prodigals come home, just hear the Christians sing. Just hear the Christians sing. It is not a stereotyped supplication I have heard over and over again for forty years, but a putting of the case in the hands of God with an importunate pleading. No long prayers. Men never pray great length unless they have nothing to say and their hearts are hard and cold. All the prayers in the Bible that were answered were short prayers. "God be merciful to me a sinner." "Lord, that I may receive thy sight." "Lord, save me, I perish." The longest prayer, Solomon's prayer at the dedication of the temple, less than eight minutes in length according to the ordinary rate of enunciation. And just hear them pray now that the prodigals are coming home. Just see them shake hands. No putting forth of the four tips of the fingers in a formal way, but a hearty grasp where the muscles of the heart seem to clinch the fingers one hand around the other hand. And even see those Christian-faces, how illuminated they are! And see that old man get up and with the same voice that sang fifty years ago in the old country meeting-house, say, "Now, Lord, lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation."

Once more I remark, that when the prodigal gets back the inhabitants of heaven keep festival. I am very certain of it.

If you have never seen a telegraph, do you have no idea how many cities are connected together, and how many lands. Nearly all the neighborhoods of the earth seem reticulated, and news flies from city to city, and from continent to continent. But more rapidly go the tidings from earth to heaven, and when a prodigal returns it is announced before he sits on the throne of God. And if these souls now present should enter the kingdom there would be some one in the heavenly kingdom to say, "That's my father." "That's my mother." "That's my son." "That's the one I used to pray for." "That's the one for whom I wept so many years," and one soul would say, "Hallelujah!"

Pleased with the news, the saints below
In songs their tongues employ;
Beyond the skies the tidings go,
And heaven is filled with joy.
Nor angels can their joy contain,
But kindle with new fire;
The sinner lost is found, they sing,
And strike the sounding lyre.

At the banquet of Lucullus sat Cicero the Orator; at the Macedonian festival at Philip the Conqueror; at the Grecian banquet sat Socrates the Philosopher; but at our Father's table sit all the returned prodigals, more than conquerors. The table is so wide, its leaves reach across seas and lands. Its guests are the redeemed of earth and the glorified of heaven. The ring of God's forgiveness on every hand. The robe of a Saviour's righteousness adroop from every shoulder. The wine that glows in the cups is from the bowls of ten thousand sacraments. Let all the redeemed of earth and all the glorified of heaven rise, and with gleaming chalices drink to the return of a thousand prodigals. Sing, sing, sing! "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive blessing, and riches, and honor, and glory, and power, world without end!" That scene of jubilation comes out before me this moment as in a sort of picture gallery. All heaven in pictures.

Look, look! There is Christ. Cuypp painted him for earthly galleries, and Correggio and Tintoretto and Benjamin West and Dore painted him for earthly galleries, but all those pictures are eclipsed by this masterpiece of heaven. Christ! Christ! There is Paul, the hero of the Sanhedrim, and of Agrippa's court-room, and of Mars Hill, and of Nero's infamy, shaking his chained fist in the very face of teeth-chattering royalty. Here is Joshua, the fighter of Bethoron and Gibeon, the man that postponed sundown. And here is Vashti, the profligacy of the Persian court unable to remove her veil of modesty or rend it, or lift it. And along the corridors of this picture gallery I find other great heroes and heroines—David with his harp, and Miriam with the cymbals, and Zechariah with the scroll, and St. John with the seven vials, and the resurrection angel with the trumpet. On, further in the corridors, see the faces of our loved ones, the cough gone from the throat, the wanness gone from the cheek, the weariness gone from the limbs, the languor gone from the eye. Let us go up and greet them. Let us go up and embrace them. Let us go up and live with them. We will! we will!

From this hilltop I catch a glimpse of those hilltops where all sorrow and sighing shall be done away. Oh, that God would make that world to us a reality. Faith in that world helped old Dr. Tyng when he stood by the casket of his dead son whose arm had been torn off in the threshing-machine, death ensuing, and Dr. Tyng, with infinite composure, preached the funeral sermon of his own beloved son. Faith in that world helped Martin Luther without one tear to put away in death his favorite child. Faith in that world helped the dying woman to see on the sky the letter "W," and they asked her what she supposed that letter "W" on the sky meant. "Oh," she said, "don't you know? 'W' stands for 'Welcome.'" Oh, heaven swing open thy gates. Oh, heaven, roll upon us some of thy sunshine anthems. Oh, heaven, flash upon us the vision of thy lustre. An old writer tells us of a ship coming from India to France. The crew was made up of French sailors who had been long from home, and as the ship came along the coast of France the men skipped the deck with glee, and they pointed to the spires of the churches where they once worshipped and to the hills where they had played in boyhood. But when the ship came into port, and these sailors saw father and mother and wife and loved ones on the wharf, they sprang ashore and rushed up the banks into the city, and the captain had to get another crew to bring the ship to her moorings. So heaven will after a while come so fully in sight, we can see its towers, its mansions, its hills, and as we go into port and our loved ones shall call from that shining shore and speak our names we will spring to the beach, leaving this old ship of a world to be managed by another crew, our rough voyaging of the seas ended forever.

FIVE GREAT REPUBLICS.

The Presidents of the Famous Group of Distinctive Popular Governments—America, France, Switzerland, Mexico, and Brazil.

A majority of historians, as a rule, there has been a failure to do justice to the republican idea. There is, by contrast, so much that is picturesque and dramatic in the pomp and glitter of thrones and crowns, beside the simplicity of republics, that the mind is unconsciously attracted and the eye fascinated by the splendors of the kingly state, and the condition of the people is overlooked and forgotten. Thus, the greater part of the history of the European nations in the past consists of a recital of wars of aggression and conquest, and the real condition of the people themselves, their progress, industry, art, education, and racial character are dismissed with an occasional reference.

In the illustration on the first page of this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are presented the portraits of the Presidents of the world's five great Republics: United States, France, Switzerland, Mexico, and Brazil. They are the representatives of the popular will in five enlightened and progressive nations, as it is expressed by a free ballot. All may truthfully be said to have "risen from the ranks." Dr. Adolf Deucher, the chief executive of Switzerland, the oldest of this group of republics, was born in 1831 in Steckborn, and studied medicine at Heidelberg, Zurich, Prague and Vienna universities. In 1856 he became a member of the Thurgau Grossen Rathes, or Upper House, and was afterward thrice elected President of that body. In 1868 the people called him to a seat in the Constitutional Rathes, and in 1869 he entered the Regierungsrath, or Swiss Parliament. From 1869 to 1873 Dr. Deucher was a member of the National Rathes, and in 1882 and 1883 was its President. From that position he rose to the Bundesrath, and in 1886 became its presiding officer. On Dec. 17 last, the combined Houses elected him Chief of the Council and of the Industrial and Internal Departments and President of the nation for 1897—an honor which his great career and faithful services well merited.

M. Francois Felix Faure who was Secretary of the Navy before he succeeded M. Casimir-Perier as President of France, is a ship-owner of Havre and has the confidence of the business people. In the Legislature he was always recognized as an authority on marine and colonial matters. He is fifty-six years of age, tall and upright of carriage, and a man of genial temperament. It is worthy of note that he is a Protestant, the first Protestant who has ever ruled over France. Belonging to the same political party as his predecessor, M. Faure has met opposition from the same political opponents and has had the same difficulties to encounter. He is exceedingly popular, however, and under his administration the republic has made marked progress in many ways.

Porfirio Diaz, President of the Republic of Mexico, is a statesman and general of humble origin, who first became noted during Maximilian's occupancy of Mexico in 1866. At the head of a republican army raised in the northern provinces, he laid siege to Puebla, and after defeating the imperial General Marquez, took the city by storm in 1867. He then proceeded to the capital, which made a stubborn resistance, but was obliged to capitulate, June 21, after General Marquez had withdrawn. Having acquired a military reputation, Diaz aspired to the Presidency. In 1871 he was named for the Presidency as a rival to Juarez. After the death of the latter in July, 1872, Diaz put himself at the head of a military insurrection, but was obliged to submit to Sebastian Lerdo, the Chief-Justice. Lerdo was elected President Oct. 27, 1872; but before his term of four years had expired, Diaz was again in rebellion and had seized the city of Matamoros. He succeeded in driving Lerdo from the country, and on May 5, 1877, Diaz was proclaimed President by Congress till Nov. 30, 1880. During his presidency, peace was maintained, the tariff revised, smuggling diminished, and several important lines of railway established, and much was done to invite the investment of foreign capital in mines and railroads. When Gen. Grant visited the country, President Diaz was assiduous in his attention to the distinguished chieftain. In 1880 an international exhibition was held in the city of Mexico, which gave abundant evidence of the resources and prosperity of the country.

On the expiry of his term, he transferred his power to General Manuel Gonzalez, the constitution forbidding any person to hold the presidency for two successive terms. General Diaz became the Minister of Public Works, but resigned this position in June, 1881, and became Governor of the province of Oaxaca. He has always been popular with the lower classes, and after reaching the presidency, succeeded in conciliating the aristocratic and conservative portions of the community. He has, since then, been re-elected three times as Chief Executive, and now holds that office. General Diaz is in his sixty-first year, and is probably the most popular citizen of his country. He is brave, generous, liberal in politics and religion, and simple in his tastes. His life has been that of a successful soldier of fortune whose influence has been employed for his country's good.

President Jose da Moraes e Barros, President of Brazil, is the genuine type of a high-born, cultured South American statesman. He is a man in middle life, finely educated, of a grave and dignified temperament, and a pronounced advocate of morality, economy and simplicity in the public service. He was selected by the National Congress and chosen by acclamation as President for the period from 1894 to 1898, Sr. Manoel Victorino Pereira being at the same time chosen as Vice-President of the Republic. Dr. Moraes enjoys the utmost confidence and respect of his countrymen, and is warmly supported by all classes. In private life he is an exemplary father and husband, affectionate and refined; and in public affairs he is a true patriot. As an orator he has few equals in Brazil. His administration has been wise and judicious, and his country has reaped the benefit of his prudence and experience in prosperity and progress at home and harmony in all its foreign relations. Brazilians love to speak of him as "one who has saved the Republic."

Our own newly-installed Chief Executive, William McKinley, of Ohio, is in his fifty-fourth year. He was born in Niles, Ohio, and was the son of an iron manufacturer. When the Civil War broke out he was a student at Allegheny College, and he enlisted as a private in a local company known as the Poland Guards, which was incorporated into the Twenty-third Ohio Volunteers. He served under Gen. R. B. Hayes, and later under Gen. Sheridan, and took part in a number of engagements. His promotion was rapid, and he was finally brevetted as Major by President Lincoln for gallantry on the field, being mustered out in 1864. Major McKinley then resumed the practice of law in Canton, O. In 1869 he was elected County Prosecuting Attorney, and in 1876 he was sent to Congress at the age of thirty-three. He served continually for fourteen years. In 1890 he was elected Governor of Ohio, and re-elected two years later. During the latter part of his service in Congress he became the Republican leader of the House, and was the foremost factor in the Tariff Bill of 1890. He was mentioned as a candidate for the nomination for President in the last three Republican National Conventions. He is a man of strong, active physique, affable in manner, cogent in debate, with a faculty for organization and detail that has rarely been equaled. He is an earnest member of the Methodist Church, and both in public and private life is esteemed by all who know him. His term opens auspiciously, and he has the warmest support and best wishes of the whole nation.

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its proprietor, and also upon those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ, are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people.

SWELLING THE CHAMPION ROLL.

Many More Candidates for Honors in the Great Sunday School Contest—
Who will Capture the Prizes?

SO widespread and active is the interest everywhere shown in the friendly Sunday School competition now going on from week to week in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that the rivalry has become national in character. Already nearly a score of states are represented and before the contest closes, it will doubtless embrace every state in the Union. We have received a number of letters from Pastors, Sunday School Superintendents and Teachers during the week in relation to the contest, but owing to lack of space in this issue, are obliged to defer their publica-

Evangelism on the Southern Border.

A Sunday School Missionary's Labors for Christ Among our Mexican Population in Arizona.

READERS OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who are already acquainted with the excellent work of the American Sunday School Union, in founding and supporting a multitude of Sunday Schools in different sections of our own land, where they were greatly needed, will be interested in the story told in the following letter of a work that is in progress on our Southwestern border. Among the Mexicans in Arizona, the American Sunday School Union has several active missionaries who are engaged in planting and fostering Sunday Schools in certain districts where the Gospel of Jesus is not now preached, and where the children have had no opportunities of a religious education. The writer is Mr. W. H. Gill.

RAMON PORRAS.

A MEXICAN BRUSH HOUSE ON THE BORDER, NEAR PHOENIX, ARIZONA.

of Phoenix, Ariz., a faithful missionary. He says: "The Palo Alto Mexican Sunday School was organized by us not long since. It is under the fostering care of the Protestant Mexican Church, located in another quarter of the city, and which also has a Sunday School of its own. They meet in a store-room, part of a large building which we have rented for religious meetings. Rev. Francisco Padierna has charge of the work. His wife plays the organ which she calls her 'bell' for calling the people together.

"A photograph which I send is that of an average Mexican brush-house with a part of the family outside and some visitors. Some of the dwellings are built of mud and brush together, and are larger but uglier than the one shown. A few live in adobe houses. These are made of bricks twelve by eighteen inches in breadth, and length, and four inches in thickness. Those dwellings are cool in summer and warm in winter. In a dry, warm climate like Arizona, a well built adobe house will last for many years. It is the cheapest building that can be erected, as the most of the material is always at hand and costs nothing. I do not include those build of brush, which can hardly be called houses, but mere brush sheds. Very many of the Mexicans live in these abodes all the year round, and such is the mildness of the climate that they keep healthy and comfortable during an occasional rainy season.

"The chief employment of the Mexicans in this valley is the cutting and hauling of firewood. This is brought into the town from desert places, ten to twenty five miles away, and sold for from $3.50 to $5 a cord.

As it takes perhaps three days for the men with four horses to cut and haul a cord, the wood is sold remarkably cheap. After feeding their teams, a bare living left for the family. In harvesting, they use the reap-hook or sickle, and the threshing and winnowing are done by method that were in use 4,000 years ago.

"The women are modest but not timid. As a rule they wear no hats or bonnets like their white sisters, but appear in public in loose garments with a shawl or veil for a headdress. They are a docile people and sociable. My belief is that the Mexican will, as far as his ability goes, act a part of the good Samaritan quite as ready as his white brother. But few of the adults can read English, but many know Spanish. Many of the children, however, are learning English in the schools. One of the great obstacles in the way of their advancement is the race prejudice that exists preventing so far any intermingling with other nationalities. Nearly all are brought up Roman Catholics, and this training does not tend to harmonize the differences in social life, but rather aggravates them. If the parochial schools could be substituted by the public schools, and if a large number of non-attendants could be induced to enter the latter in which a rising generation of Mexicans and Americans could be brought together in competition, it would, doubtless, be a long step in advance for the former.

"Unhappily for this unfortunate class the teachings of Rome are such as stifle independent thought, and keep devotees in blind superstition, thus preventing progress intellectually and religiously which I conceive to be the only way in which the social gap can be closed between the races. Yet some progress is being made. Mexican people are, many of them, full fledged American citizens.

THE $10,000 MARK PASSED!

The Christian Herald's Fund for the Relief of the Famine Sufferers in India Now Over Ten Thousand Dollars and Still Rising.

It is with profound thankfulness that we announce this week the receipt from the generous readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, of contributions which bring the total thus far sent for the Indian Famine Relief Fund to ten thousand four hundred dollars. What it means to the starving people cannot be told. It means literally ten thousand deaths from starvation averted and ten thousand human lives sustained till the next harvest. How sorely the help was needed, is proved by the cable dispatch from Delhi, just arrived, that in Sirsa alone, more than forty thousand persons have perished. From all the famine districts goes up the agonizing prayer that M. Fleming, the poet of India, so eloquently voices:

Lord Christ, who fed the multitude
In bygone days on earth.
Look down upon thy people here
Oppressed by drouth and dearth.
The earth is iron underfoot,
The sky is brass o'erhead.
The water dwindles in the wells,
The grass is burnt and dead.
O, God of Mercy, Goodness, Love,
Who savest man and beast,
Send rain upon the barren land,
Show glory in the East!
Grant unto us, who cry to thee—
For when was prayer in vain?
The miracle of mighty clouds,
The manna of the rain!
So shall the seed be prosperous,
The earth give her increase,
The dew from heaven plenteous,
The dearth and terror cease.
Have mercy, and avert from us
The turning, flaming sword:
From famine, plague and pestilence
Deliver us, good Lord!

That THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was providentially guided in sending its contribution to the American missionaries for distribution, is proved by a letter just received from

Our Own Correspondent.

When he wrote, had just returned from a long journey through the famine districts. Mr. Aitken writes: "I plead earnestly the cause of miseries in connection with the children. I urge the Christian people of America to remember that many of their missionaries are now increasing their obligations, by doubling their cares in their almost desperate anxiety not to let the helpless children perish for want of food. Many are the ways in which the little ones suffer the worst of the present dire distress. When a family finds no means of subsistence, and starts out from the homestead, the members very soon get separated, the men going to work in one place and the women in another. In such cases the children are usually left with the mother, who is soon obliged to abandon them, if needed, they do not die on her hands. If she dies first, their end is short and sure, unless some passer-by who is not starving himself, or some compassionate policeman, take charge of them. These little victims are to be had by the score, and I lately come on the tracks of missionaries who are gathering them in. Therefore I would plead for liberal help for those whose schools and orphanages have their running expenses greatly increased all at once by this large-hearted benevolence."

This statement is confirmed by a letter which, through the courtesy of the American Board, we are able to publish, from Mr. E. S. Hume, who is one of the missionaries to whom THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's first remittance of five thousand dollars was providentially sent. Mr. Hume writes: "The famine in India is a fearful fact. One who has never seen a starved person cannot imagine how such one looks. It is difficult to believe that the object before you is a human being. The head is out of proportion, the arms and legs are like sticks, the skin looks like dried up parchment, and is generally covered with sores. It is heart-rending to hear the pitiful cries and moans of the children, and to see the sad and anxious and hopeless faces of the adults. While these poor creatures are thus suffering it does seem as if no one should wait one single hour unless he is doing all that can be done to relieve all this terrible distress. One of the best ways for us to help is for us to take the children whom we can get hold of into our schools. The sooner we do this the better, for the longer we wait the more famished the poor things grow, and the less prospect that they can ever be restored to health and strength. Even small sums are of value at such times. Those who wish us to make use of this golden opportunity should remember that it will soon pass. What we do for the salvation of these dying multitudes must be done now."

Such an appeal cannot be ignored. Mr. Hume and the other devoted men who are engaged in this Christ-like work must be sustained. They dread the coming of the day when their treasury empty, they will have to tell the poor, starving creatures that they have no food to give them. We believe our readers will continue to do all they can to avert such a calamity, and that all who have not contributed will do so quickly. Remember, every dollar goes intact to feed the famished people, and there others, who give in the name of Christ and for love of him: Mrs. Roiser writes respecting the contribution sent by the boys in her class in the Mizpah Sunday School, Detroit, Mich. The boys were so touched by hearing of the suffering of the people of India. The knowledge of people being hungry appealed to them at once, and each one gave so willingly that I feel the Lord will bless them for it; for they do not belong to the class of people who can give without missing it. I know it involved self-denial for them.

One of four, Lynchburg, Va.: This is a tiny pebble to throw into the ocean, but God can make the wave reach the other shore.

The Pulse of the World.

WE all read the newspapers, but every busy man and woman wants to know how to read them. If our time be limited, take the editorials which are a summation of important events. Take the reports of educational, artistic and religious meetings. Do not sit down to a banquet of arsons and manslaughter and divorce cases. What you read in the newspapers finally decides your character. The newspaper is the library of the great masses of the people, and out of it they must make their selection. Read chiefly those parts of the paper which are best calculated to improve you. Read what will make you better, not what will make you worse. We are not worthy of citizenship unless we keep our eyes open to the events which affect the welfare of the community where we live. But gossip, whether on the tongue of the gadabout, or printed in newspaper columns, will improve neither body, mind nor soul. It takes all kinds of information to make a newspaper; but we are not expected to devour all any more than when a man sits at the table is he expected to eat everything on it, making no distinction between sugar and salt, sweet oil and vinegar. There are many things that do for spices that will not do to take in large quantities. We want more common sense in newspaper perusal. What a mighty advantage it gives us all twice a day to feel the pulse of all Christendom; the morning papers telling us how the world is at daybreak, the evening papers telling us how the world is at sundown. What opportunities we have for watching the world's progress.

All the world brought so near together, we ought to have an all embracing sympathy. So much intelligence implies a corresponding responsibility. I suppose God is preparing all these newspapers and telegraphic and telephonic wires and railroads so as to make quick work of the world's final evangelization. The Bible idea of nations born in a day is by most people taken as figurative. I take it as literal. All the oceans cabled, all the continents strung to ether with electric wire, some time in one hour all nations may get the gospel call, and the next morning or evening papers have for head lines the names of ten or twenty nations born unto God that day.

Let us in the rise and fall,
In the dominion of our King,
Arise and stand as one,
And with the Lord be true.

BRIEF NOTES.

CAUTION.—Complaints have reached the office of persons in New Jersey being swindled by man who fraudulently pretends to be a canvasser for this journal. Persons intending to subscribe will do well to be on their guard against him. It always better to send the money direct to this office unless the subscriber personally knows the person through whom he sends it.

Owing to the unusual pressure of advertising upon our columns this week, the regular Music Page is omitted. The Christian Endeavor Topic will be found on page 183.

Major Whittle and Mr. George C. Stebbins are now evangelizing at Dumfries, Scotland. They report a deep religious interest having accompanied the work just closed at Greenock.

Christian Endeavor Societies are rapidly increasing in the missionary field. Dr. Farnham, Shanghai, Dr. Wallace of Mexico, and many other missionaries testify to the benefits derived from societies.

Evangelist E. R. Hermiston writes us that he has had a time of blessing at Brantford, Ont., one meeting alone twenty persons made profession of faith, and each evening during his visit souls were received.

Commander Ballington Booth of the Volunteers conducts a noonday meeting every Tuesday at the Metropolitan Temple, Seventh Avenue at Fourteenth Street, New York. He is assisted by his staff and has very interesting and successful meetings.

Dr. Henry Jessup who has been traveling Egypt for recuperation is reported to be now on way back to his field much strengthened. He has been prostrated by whooping cough, a complaint which seldom attacks a person of mature life without danger.

A musicale for the benefit of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home at Nyack-on-the-Hudson, was given on Thursday, Feb. 25, at residence of Prof. Henry Eyre Browne, 330 Lafayette Avenue, Brooklyn. The gathering was large and representative one and a substantial sum was netted for the charity.

Gypsy Smith and three other Evangelists have been conducting a great religious campaign at Bradford, England. Sixteen churches were visited and at all of them there were large congregations and many additions to the membership.

Mr. Richard Cadbury, a Christian manufacturer of Birmingham, England, has recently voted a sum of money to a wise benefaction. He presented a Bible to every pupil above a certain grade in the public schools of the city. The ports from the schools aggregated over two thousand. Mr. Cadbury was surprised at the number, but he did not curtail the gift.

Bishop Whipple of Minnesota draws striking contrast between the past and the present condition of Indians among whom he began his thirty-eight years ago. The attitude of the government toward them has greatly changed, also public opinion, and there were now in his diocese no Indian members of his church than there were white communicants when he was elected bishop.

The Church Missionary Society is taking steps to inaugurate a new aggressive work in Africa. The limits of the Colony of Sierra Leone have been extended and government stations for the interior have outrun missionary outposts. There is an urgent call for Christian leaders to forward evangelistic work in the "hinterland."

Rev. Thomas Harrison will commence series of revival meetings on March 14 at the Tabernacle Methodist Episcopal Church, Greenport, Brooklyn, of which Dr. H. E. Burnes is pastor. Mr. Harrison held meetings in the same church eight years ago. He will have among his assistants and workers many who were converted during his former visit. One of them is now a trustee of the church.

Dr. L. W. Munhall is holding meeting at Oakland, Cal. On February 14 he preached in the "Theatre," which was crowded by young men. Dr. Munhall pointed out the various sins by which men go to ruin, and especially dwell on the theatre and the saloon as wide and much traveled roads. In response to his invitation over a hundred and fifty young men rose for prayer.

During this month the Evangelistic meetings in Cooper Union, New York, will be continued under the management of Dr. A. C. Dixon. They are well-attended. Every Monday afternoon Dr. Dixon will preach, and on the other days of the week Saturdays excepted, Evangelist Schuyler will conduct the meetings. Mr. Moody closed his services at Carnegie Music Hall on Feb. 28th. Dr. Dixon will hold a service in that building on Sunday afternoon through March.

A Conference for Bible study will be held at Cleveland, Ohio, in Association Hall, March 14. There will be three sessions each day. Among the speakers will be Rev. George C. Needham, Rev. J. Erdman, Prof. W. G. Morehead, Pastor J. L. Scofield and Prof. F. F. Streeter. All inquiries about the conference, accommodations, etc., will be addressed to Mr. F. M. Barton, V. M. C., Cleveland, Ohio, who will shortly after the conference be able to supply a stenographic report of the proceedings.

During the past week Mrs. Helen L. Bull of Elmira, N. Y., has held W. C. T. U. meetings at several churches of New York City, which have been largely attended. Among them were the Eighteenth Street M. E. Church; the West End Presbyterian; the Bloomingdale Reformed; the Michael's Protestant Episcopal, and Grace Methodist Episcopal. Mrs. Bullock has now been laboring in the city since the close of January and has done an excellent work in arousing and maintaining public interest in the Temperance cause.

The Palestine Exploration Society has made an interesting discovery. In trying to find the old wall on the south side of Jerusalem a magnificent staircase was uncovered. When the debris of eighteen centuries was removed, thirty-four broad massive steps were revealed, leading down to the pool of Siloam. There is no doubt that this is the staircase referred to by Nehemiah as "the stairs that go down from the City of David." As the staircase leads to the temple, it may also have been the "Ascent," which impressed the Queen of Sheba when she visited Solomon.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

Greece Menaced.

CRETE is still the problem on which the diplomatists of Europe are exercising their ingenuity. How to devise a solution which will reconcile the conflicting interests of Turkey, Greece, Russia and England, seems to be beyond their powers. Incidentally the wishes of the people of Crete come under consideration. The diplomatists are not accustomed to take such matters into account. Autocracy is apparently the favorite scheme. The Sultan as suzerain and receiver of tribute; but the Cretans do not desire autonomy, but annexation to Greece, and the Greeks naturally favor that plan. The powers, however, insist on Greece withdrawing from the island, and England demands that Turkey shall also withdraw being the final settlement of the question. They gave Greece a practical intimation of their determination to be carried out by firing on the insurgents when the latter attacked the capital. The spectacle of the powers firing on Christians in the interest of Mohammedans excited the indignation of European peoples. The Emperor of Germany appears to be the leader of the concert in opposition to Greece. He urges the powers to compel Greece to withdraw from the island and blockade the Piræus, the port of Athens, and other Greek ports, until Greece obeys. Russia has sent a peremptory order to Greece to withdraw within ten days, and intimates that serious consequences will ensue if Greece continues to defy the powers. On the other hand, the Sultan has been restrained from attacking Greece. The powers seem thus to have taken on themselves the role of a politician who stops a fight by compelling both parties to retire, as Greece is no match for Turkey in the field, she profits by the interference, unpleasant as it is. For one thing we may be thankful; Greece, by her bold action in going to the defense of the Cretan Christians, saved them from massacre. If some power had thus interposed in Armenia thousands of Christian lives might have been saved. All Europe will be glad if Greece ultimately gets the island as a reward, but in any case, the powers will not restore it to Turkey, in the face of public opinion in Europe. If the other Christian territories that the Turk misgoverns were delivered from his yoke it would be well: because he remembered not to show mercy, but persecuted the poor and needy and the broke in me, to slay them. (Ps. 109:16, R. V.)

Inauguration Bible.

A dispatch from Springfield, O., gives a detailed description of the Bible which will be used in the inauguration of Major McKinley. It has been specially printed a bound for the purpose, and has been printed on behalf of the donors to the President-elect by Bishop Arnett of the Alban Methodist Episcopal Church. The covers are red, under gold, with round corners. The linings are of white moire and striped satin and silk. Inside the front and back covers are beautiful panels lined with dark blue turkey morocco, known as Bishop's purple, finished in gold. The centres of the panels are of white satin. On the satin centre on the front panel is printed an inscription of presentation. The paper upon which the book is printed was made at an Ohio mill. The pages are unsurpassed for clearness and beauty of style. The binding is of the best and most superb grosgrain morocco, dark blue in color. It has a fine line of gold around the outer edge. A pure gold plate in the centre has engraved upon it the following inscription: "William McKinley, President of the United States of America, inaugurated March 4, 1897." A more appropriate gift from a Christian people to the Chief whom they have elected could not be made. It will be well for him and for the nation if he uses it as the ruler of God's ancient people was directed: It shall be with him and he shall read therein all the days of his life; that he may learn to fear the Lord his God, to keep all the words of this law and these statutes to do them. (Deut. 17:19.)

Appreciated Stock.

A press dispatch from Portland, Ore., reports a remarkable acquisition of fortune by a tailor of Moscow, Idaho. The tailor recently went to his bank to get an insurance policy which he had deposited there with other papers for safe keeping. In turning over the papers to find the policy, he came upon some soiled documents which at once arrested the eye of the cashier who was watching the tailor's treasures. He asked the tailor what those documents were. The tailor replied that they had been given to him five years before, by a customer who was not able to blood. He has been working on this theory for several months past, and has constructed two instruments to aid him in his investigations. One of these is an extremely delicate balance of the spirit-level kind. The balance is a board sufficiently large to hold a man lying at full length, and is suspended so that it will swing lightly on pivots at the centre. So delicate are its movements, that a weight almost as light as a feather will cause the balance to deflect towards the head or the feet. A man lay upon this board perfectly quiescent, and the balance was exactly horizontal; but so soon as his attention was called to a problem and he began to think, the end of the board on which his head lay, dipped. Another test used was a glass cylinder enclosing the arm to the elbow, and closing with rubber around the elbow. This was filled with water and a small glass tube half way down the larger one communicated with it at right angles. When the man was perfectly quiescent the water rose about an inch in the cross-tube, but so soon as he began to think, the water fell and barely filled the larger tube, showing that the size of the arm had decreased as the brain called the blood from the hand and arm to help it in its work. Even a dream had this effect, though in a slighter degree. By what organs the brain thus calls for the blood from other parts of the body when it needs it, no one knows; but it evidently has such organs, and its call is obeyed. We can but wish that as much could be said for that figurative body of the church to which the apostle compares it. When who had paid no interest in two years. He was foolish to lend so much on the land, the farmer admitted, but it was done now. He would not do anything in it anyway, but he was going to see about that egg account. The lawyer laughed when his client was gone and said the man was always like that, indifferent about matters that were really important and very strenuous about trifles. Probably there are not many men of that kind, but at the last it will be found how large is the number of those who have made a similar mistake as to the relative importance of temporal and spiritual things: So is he that layeth up treasure for him self and is not rich toward God. (Luke 12:21.)

A Costly Rats'-Nest.

A strange discovery has been made in the house of a recently-deceased citizen of Dobbs Ferry, N. Y. The man had been remarkably careful in his expenditure, and as he and his family had several ways of making money, it was believed that he would leave a snug little fortune behind him. All that the widow could find, however, was $250. Recently the widow employed a carpenter to transform a cowshed into a chicken-coop. In the course of the work he tore up the floor, and there, under the boards, he found a rats'-nest constructed of greenbacks. The rats had found a treasure, which the old man had secreted, and had carried some of it off to line their nest. The bills were in fragments, but it was possible to piece together some of the tens and twenties. In all the lining of the nest was worth nearly five hundred dollars, and now it is hoped that the hiding place will be found from which the rats abstracted the bills. There is grim irony in that man's lot. That the result of all his long years of toil should have been used to make a litter of young rats comfortable in their nest seems cruel. If he could have foreseen it, it would have almost driven him crazy. If he knows of it now it will make little difference to him. On the other side of the grave the important question is not as to the money left behind, or what becomes of it, but whether through Christ eternal riches have been secured.

Charge them that are rich in this world . . . that they do good . . . laying up in store for themselves a good foundation against the time to come that they may lay hold on eternal life. (1. Timothy 6:17-18.)

Water from a Reed.

A curious method of obtaining water in an emergency is described by a gentleman who was at one time a member of a United States geological and surveying expedition in Indian Territory. The party had been for some time without water, and at last the search for water became the chief object of concern, as all were suffering from the want of it. One of the party was an old trapper, whose experience of the territory had several times proved valuable to the others. He was particularly eager in his search for water, and finally he paused at a place and examined the soil. He announced that there was water near the surface which could be secured by digging a well. That, however, could not be done. But the trapper wanted water too badly to be defeated. He searched around till he found a reed. He wrapped some moss around the end and, digging a hole, he inserted the reed and filled up the hole and stamped the soil hard. In a few minutes he applied his lips to the reed and declared the water very good. Other members of the party in turn followed his example, and were rewarded with a most delicious drink of water. "How is it, it is so clear?" the trapper was asked. He explained that the moss acted as a filter, and the soil being full of water readily yielded it. He said that more than once he had been saved from much suffering by the same simple device. It was well for the party that the trapper was among them, otherwise though with water so near them, they would have continued to suffer of thirst. It is so with those who are thirsting for salvation and know not that it is within their reach. Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money, come ye buy and eat. (Isa. 55:1.)

PIRÆUS, THE PORT OF ATHENS, NOW THREATENED WITH BLOCKADE.

pay for a suit of clothes he had ordered. The tailor had tried to sell them, but he could not get anyone to pay anything for them. He had put them away in disgust, and had marked the suit of clothes in his books as a total loss. He had forgotten all about the transaction till he saw the stock among his other papers. He speedily became interested, however, when the cashier told him that the value of the shares had been going up for some time and were then worth forty thousand dollars. In a business transaction such as this, the tailor doubtless took into account the possibility of a gain, but he must have been surprised at a gain so enormous. There will, the Bible tells us, be similar surprise in the day of final award when Christ's servants who have taken pity on his poor and helped them without any expectation of gain and have forgotten it, find to their amazement that their Lord has taken note of the deed done in his name and rewards them according to his riches: Then shall the righteous answer, Lord, when saw we thee a-hungred and fed thee? . . . And the King shall say unto them, verily, I say unto you, inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto me. (Matt. 25:40.)

To Measure Thought.

It would not seem possible to measure anything so intangible as thought, but an effort to do so has been made by Professor Mosso of the University of Turin. He proceeds on the theory that when the brain has work to do, it calls upon the other parts of the body to supply it with any members of that body are in need of sustenance there should be the same promptitude in supplying it. That there be no schism in the body, but that the members should have the same care one for another. (1. Cor. 12:25.)

The Farmer's Perspective.

A curious illustration of the lack of a right estimate of relative importance of transactions was given to the New York Sun by a city lawyer. Among his clients is a wealthy farmer who came to the city recently to consult the lawyer in respect to several affairs. The one to which he devoted most of the interview, and to which he had given a good deal of careful thought was whether or not a balance was due to the man to whom the farmer sold his eggs. It was complicated by a previous deal in which there had been a dispute as to whether an egg belonged to the category of "new-laid eggs, fresh eggs, or simply eggs;" also by a question of responsibility for one or two eggs which had been broken in transit. The farmer had thought the matter out and, he stated his views with such careful deliberation of manner and speech as to tire the lawyer, who reminded him that the whole question involved only a few cents. The farmer said he had always been careful of cents and the matter being disposed of was about to leave, when the lawyer reminded him that he had referred to some mortgages about which he needed advice. "I had forgotten them," said the farmer. From his story it appeared that he had lent thirty-two thousand dollars to a man

Christian Self-Restraint.

1 Cor. 9: 19-27. Golden Text, 1 Cor. 9: 25. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

CHRISTIAN self-restraint is self-restraint after the pattern of Christ and by the power of Christ. It is one of the fruits of the Spirit, (Gal. 5: 22), and is called in the authorized version "temperance" but in the Revised "self-control." It is one of the things which the apostle Peter teaches us to add unto our faith, (1 Pet. 1: 6); and he places it between "knowledge" and "patience," showing us that knowledge which does not result in this self-control does not attain its legitimate object, and cannot bring forth that patience which, when it has its perfect work, makes us "perfect and entire, wanting nothing." While it is called in Scripture self-control, it is practically Christ-control, but it can only exist and last where there is the fullest co-operation of our own will with the control of our Lord by his Spirit. It is neither independent self-government nor is it the despotic rule of Christ. It may seem to be a paradox to such as know not the Lord, but it is nevertheless true, that in measure as we yield ourselves to Jesus we have power over ourselves. In the chapter before us the apostle is dealing with

His Rights.

According to the Revised Version he says: "Have we no right to eat and to drink? Have we no right to lead about a wife that is a believer? Or I only and Barnabas, have we not a right to forbear working?" (ver. 5, 6). "If others partake of this right over you, do not we yet more? Nevertheless, we did not use this right." (ver. 12). "There is nothing about which 'the flesh,' i.e. our self-life is more sensitive than our rights; that is what we think to be due us from others. Paul knew well what his rights were, but he did not exercise them, nor did he complain against those who robbed him of his rights. A year before he wrote this epistle to the Corinthians in A.D. 53, he had written in A.D. 58 to the Galatians, 'I am crucified with Christ,' and above and over all his rights he gloried in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ whereby the world was crucified to him and he unto the world. (Gal. 6: 14). Paul was a consistent man; he did not assume the position of a man crucified with Christ just when he was in the act of preaching or praying, and then in the common affairs of life act as one who was not crucified, but keenly alive to his own interests; but he maintained this position which he had taken by faith, right through all the details of his daily life. He had as much right to marry a Christian woman, and have around him the comforts of domestic life, as any other Christian man. But called as he was, to bear Christ's name 'before the Gentiles, and kings, and the children of Israel,' to be 'in journeyings often and in many perils, he would not exercise his right, which was lawful but

Not Expedient.

Paul had a right to expect that those to whom he preached should maintain him and his companions. This he asserts in a strong way: "What soldier ever serveth at his own charges? Who planteth a vineyard and eateth not of the fruit thereof, or who feedeth a flock, and eateth not the milk of the flock?" (1 Cor. 9: 6, 7). And he quotes from the book of the laws that the very oxen who tread out the corn are not to be muzzled how much more then should spiritual teachers be maintained by those to whom they minister? He brings forward the strongest argument to prove his point: "If we sowed unto you spiritual things, is it a great matter if we shall reap your carnal things?" And after reminding the Corinthians that the priests in the temple are maintained by their part in the sacrificial offerings, he says with emphasis, "Even so did the Lord ordain that they which proclaim the Gospel should live by the Gospel."

Having thus fully established his right, this man who could speak to others about a citizenship—Luther translation citizen rights—in heaven goes on to say, "But I have used none of these things." Paul had closely examined his chartered rights in heaven in the light of the life and teaching of his Lord. "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness and all things shall be added unto you," with the exhortation: "Be not anxious what ye shall eat or what ye shall drink or wherewithal ye shall be clothed," had entered deeply into his soul. He had found in the exercise of his heavenly rights a glorious freedom from himself in dealing with God about everything which set him free from every burden about things temporal. He knew that God cared for him and that his interests were safe with him. Thus when some would benefit from his ministry and make no return, selfishly callous as to whether he had food or clothing, there would be no bitterness or spirit of harsh judgment in the mind of Paul, he would simply know that God's help would come to him in some other way, and he Remained Self-Controlled.

There was one thing in which Paul gloried. It was not his preaching of the gospel that had become the necessity of his life, "woe is unto me if I preach not the gospel," he speaks of it as a stewardship committed unto him, but his glorying and his reward was "That, when I preach the Gospel, I may make the Gospel without charge so as not to use to the full my right in the Gospel." Here we have an example of true Christian self-control: self-denied instead of asserted and considered.

The apostle gives us more of his life when he says, "For though I was free from all men, I brought myself under bondage to all that I might gain the more. And to the Jews I became as a Jew, that I might gain the Jews, to them that are under the law, as under the law, that I might gain them that are under the law; to them that are without law, as without law, being not without law to God, but under the law to Christ that I might gain them that are without law." Here is, in fact, another side of Christian self-restraint. How many there are, even of true Christians who value themselves on their doctrinal exactitude, who trust in themselves that they are in the right and, like the Pharisees, despise others. Paul, who had gone through much experience and had passed through phase after phase, under the law, was ready to meet each one where he was. Instead of ventilating his own superior knowledge, Paul came down to the level of every weak, ignorant, superstitious or legal inquirer with whom he had to do, and took him on his own ground. He had learned his Master's lesson, "I have many things to say unto you but ye cannot bear them now." Paul knew that he could not gain the Jews in the same way as the Gentiles. He knew well the Jewish standpoint, but it would have been useless to speak to the literary philosophical Athenian in the same way as to the Jews. Thus Paul exercised self-control, he might lose ground with the Jews by his work among the Gentiles, and vice versa, but what things were gain to him in his doctrinal prestige, these he counted loss for Christ. How many are afraid of being thought ignorant or being counted inconsistent if they simply follow the leading of the Spirit of God in dealing with souls! How many are ready to sacrifice souls on the altar of their personal reputation. The Holy Ghost never establishes our consistency or ministers to our prestige: "He shall glorify me," said our beloved Lord. Paul thought it worth while to become as weak that he might gain the weak, and he remains one of the greatest and most influential man that ever lived.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

IT is not difficult to understand why Paul wrote to the people at Corinth such words as those of the lesson. He had lived a year-and-a-half among them and knew the kind of temptation that assailed them, and what were the sins into which they were liable to fall. The necessity for such teaching has not passed away. If Paul were to spend a year in New York, Washington, or Chicago at this day, and afterwards were to write a letter to the Christians of either city, it would probably be a letter full of just such teaching. Corinth was a city full of active, wealthy, pleasure loving people, such as are to be found in our own cities to-day. They made the people. The city was a marvel of architectural beauty. Its temples, amphitheatre and its private residences were magnificent. But it was morally corrupt. The merchants who resorted thither found every provision made in profusion for the gratification of their licentious passions. The very worship of the city was a vicious orgie. The people revelled in vice and many of the merchants who went there for a brief stay, gave away the whole of their fortunes in their drunken maudlin revelry. From an incidental reference that the Apostle makes (1 Cor. 9), we learn how corrupt had been the life of some of the men and women who composed the church that he gathered there during the visit described in A.D. 18: 1-18. These people surrounded Paul with fascinations, seeing the pleasures still going on in which they formerly indulged, were strongly drawn back into their old ways. Some of them yielded, and the Apostle was extremely anxious about the others. He appears to have written them three letters, only the second and the fourth which have survived in the New Testament. In these he earnestly begs them to live the higher life, to keep their bodies in subjection, to live after the spirit and not after the flesh. He reminds them how the wrestlers and athletes in the games deny themselves that they might win the prize, and urges his converts to show similar self-denial that they might win the greater prize. He recalls to their memory his example, and tells them he still has to keep his body in subjection lest he should become a castaway. By every means he urges them to restrain their appetites, propensities and live a pure life. A told the Romans, those who indulge after the flesh, indulging themselves, would die; only they who lived after the spirit, seeking spiritual delight and spiritual achievements, would have eternal life. And this fact is as true in America at the present time as it was in Corinth eighteen centuries ago.

All things to all Men. This does not mean that Paul changed his principles, but that he adapted himself to the people he was dealing with. Cecil, the great preacher, was addressing a sleepy audience of miners who could not get their attention. "I must get them to listen; I have them attend," he men exclaimed. But how? Tell me something they will take an interest in. He described an execution he had witnessed, and instantly every one was listening eagerly and they listened, while he pressed the lesson of the crime. John Wesley complained bitterly of an audience he had at a place called Minton. He gave them, he says, only elementary teaching, saying that they were gay, genteel people, but it was beyond their depth. "It is very hard he comments, 'to be sharp enough for a polite audience'."

A Corruptible Crown. A French officer who was an avowed infidel, and the leader of a company of infidels, read the Bible during a period of imprisonment when no other book was accessible, and became a believer. After his release he went to his infidel friends and told them of his conversion, he ridiculed him and called him a "Bernadotte?" He asked them, referring to the French officer who had been king of Sweden. "He became a Catholic." "Ah, that was different," they said. "He got a crown." "Well," said the officer, "I shall receive an eternal crown."

They who run in a race. The people to whom Paul wrote knew all about races. They included races, leaving the disk, and wrestling. The prize was a wreath of pine leaves. The State sent its deputation, each with the others in splendor. No Sicily was so great that it did not feel honored if one of its citizens was a victor in the game. When he returned home he was received in triumph and all his privileges and immunities were granted him. It was worth all the sacrifice and pleasure and the self-denial of the training he had to go through in order to win money easily and abundantly, and they spent it freely on vicious indulgences. The city was beautifully and advantageously situated. A glance at the map shows that the southern half of Greece is almost an island. A strip of land about three-and-a-half miles wide unites this half to the half on the mainland. At the southern end of the strip rises the mountain of Acrocorinthus, its summit crowned with a citadel. On the side of the mountain, about two hundred feet above its base, the city of Corinth was planted. On its right was the port of Cenchrae, on its left, the port of Lachraeum, and on a level plain in front was the great marble stadium where the Isthmian athletic games took place. Corinth's situation was favorable to traffic. Owing to the dangers of navigating vessels around Malea, the southern promontory of Greece, vessels were either unloaded at one of the ports and the goods sold at Corinth, or the vessels were raised up bodily out of the water and dragged over land on huge trucks to the opposite port and re-launched. This traffic brought a great deal of trade and profit to

THE FAMILY AND HOME CIRCLE.

An Alabama Homestead.

Health and Longevity accompany hard Work—A Family Where even the Children are Septuagenarians.

ANY of our readers have doubtless heard of the Sadler family of White Plains, Ala., whose members are noted for longevity. In the photograph on this page, a group of the "children" of this ned family is seen, the average age of the remarkable quintette of "children" being about seventy years, and their cumulative ages little less than three and a-half centuries. These venerable women have lived at home with their parents almost all their lives, and their furthest travels have been bounded by the limits of the territory that can be seen from the front of the old farm-house. They are practical farmers, too; they know all the methods of cultivation in vogue in their section, and raise on the farm nearly everything that is needed for the daily subsistence.

There is probably no section of the Union more healthful and pleasanter than the forest or "piney woods" region of Alabama, which comprises a large portion of the State lying south of the "Black Belt," or cotton-growing region. It is not so liable to disagreeable extremes of temperature as to sudden changes, as the interior, and the summers are longer, less oppressive, and near the coast, tempered by steady breezes. Save in a few of the valleys, miasma is almost unknown, and the health-giving odors of the pine forests are refreshing and invigorating, being especially beneficial to sufferers from pulmonary troubles. Besides the immense pine forests of South Alabama, there are in the lowlands of the same section an abundance of other woods, including gigantic cypress trees, juniper, live oak, ash, magnolia, bay, and gum trees. There are probably many other families in Alabama whose combined ages equal that of the Sadlers, for the State has a wonderful record for health and longevity. There is an abundance of springs and streams of pure water. The climate of the uplands is delightful the year round, and there is probably no more attractive region for the naturalist and botanist to be found anywhere.

Breton Wedding.

How early a Breton maid marries, writes Isabel McDougall in a contemporary, depends somewhat upon her good looks, but more upon the stripes upon her petticoat. A silver band woven round it means a dowry of 300 francs; two silver stripes mean 600, and so on, till the damsel who proudly wears stripes nearly up to her waist is an heiress indeed. Not one of these pretty Annettes and Pierrettes, moreover, would dare to add another band to her skirt unless the parental cash-box justified the assumption. As to the costumes worn at church or at a wedding, there turn out occasions of sunburned, fair-haired men in short blue jackets, vests bedizened with metal buttons as their great-grandfathers, the Chouans, wore to face the minions of the first republic; broad felt hats, with peacock feathers stuck in their bands; wooden shoes, gaiters and baggy breeches of stout homespun. And the girls, how quaintly they come arrayed! Their costumes descend from remote times; broad ribbons over the breasts of their bodices, full short skirts and aprons of brocade—brown linen with large flowers in apple-green silk, or red and purple damask, shot with threads of gold and silver.

Let us get to the table. Remember, though, that a Breton farmer's hospitality is not limited by his four walls. Half the countryside would be asked, and long trenches be dug for the invited guests to comfortably put their feet in as they sat upon the edges. Sheep would be roasted whole for them; rabbits, tender and white-fleshed as chickens; omelettes, cooked as by magic in the rudest of vessels over an open faggot fire; and shrimps, as dear to the heart of the Brittany coast man as clams to dwellers on our own Atlantic seaboard.

Let the Children Help.

If tired mothers would only try the experiment of letting the boys and girls help them at times, they would find them valuable and willing assistants. A writer says: "The other day we saw three large, able-bodied boys lounging about the house, not knowing what to do with themselves, while their mother, tired and pale, was wonderful cat named Tom which, when addressed, will quickly respond, even waking out of a sound sleep to go toward the speaker. Sometimes, to confuse him, the clerks will sing out some word or words in which the syllable "Tom" is emphasized, and to that he pays no attention. But let any one call, "Tom, it's dinner time!" and forthwith he walks across the room, reaches up with his paws to a tin pail, claws it down, and comes bringing it in his mouth. Tom is fond of music. At the cry of "Hand-organ!" he climbs to a high window seat, but at the words, "Here's a dog!" he slinks under a desk.

Spending Sunday.

In a multitude of homes—home that would disdain to be called anything but Christian—Sunday is sadly wasted. A forenoon attendance at church and possibly a session of Sunday School for the children in the afternoon, still leaves a large part of the day to be accounted for. Many find it difficult to attend two services. Says a thoughtful writer: "Let Sunday afternoon and evenings have the brightest possible ideas talked over, sung over, thought over in the homes; let them have abundantly, what they have only sparingly at other times, penetrating insight into God's purposes for mankind and intelligent conception of the world's needs; let them have parents, children, servants, wisely, patiently, gladly ponder-trying to do the work for a large family and company alone. Not a boy's work to help about the house? Why not? Is there anything about house duties that will injure him or that he cannot learn to do well? On the contrary, there is much to benefit him in such work, the most important of which is the idea that it isn't manly to let the mother carry all the burdens when it is possible for strong young hands to help. Many a smart boy wants to help his tired mother, but doesn't know how beyond bringing in the wood and the water, and shoveling a path through the snow. This done, she tells him to go and play, while she plods wearily on. It is a positive harm to a boy's or girl's moral character to allow them to think it right to be idle while mother is staggering under her burdens. Let the children help.

Intelligent Cats.

A writer in Our Animal Friends gives some very interesting illustrations of feline intelligence. He mentions a New York young lady who has a cat that trails so closely after her as to be almost stepped upon. The chief clerk of the State Department at Washington has a cat with the same accomplishment. It will follow him about the streets for miles just like a dog, and is fond of going out with him for a walk in the evenings. In the Treasury Department at Washington there is a very ing the mystery of godliness—and then, every instrumentality of Christ's church in America will feel a new vigor animating it." Even a home Sunday evening, where church is unattainable, may be made spiritually profitable by the reading of good books, a hearty home song service, and a Scripture reading. On that day, above other days, the thoughts of God's children should be:

This is the day which the Lord has made;
We will rejoice and be glad in it.

An utter disregard of the Sabbath in the training of children is a great wrong; but even a greater wrong than this is the training of children to count the Lord's day a day of irksome restraint instead of delight.

Lifted Over.

As tender mothers guiding baby steps,
When places come, at which the tiny feet
Would trip, lift up the little ones in arms
Of love, and set them down again, beyond the harm—
So did our Father watch the precious boy,
Led o'er the stones by me, who stumbled oft Myself, but strove to help my darling on.
He saw the sweet limbs faltering and saw
Rough ways before us where my arms would fail,
So reached from heaven, and lifting the dear child,
Who smiled in leaving me, he put him down
Beyond all hurt; beyond my sight and bade Him wait for me. Shall I not then be glad
And thanking God, press on to overtake?

THE SHADOW OF A ROCK.

FAINT and weary from the heat
And the burden of the day;
Longing for a cool retreat
Where the breezes gently play,
Lo, I find it with the flock
Of the shepherd meek but grand,
In the shadow of a rock,
In a weary, weary land.

When the troubles of my life
Weaken mind and crush my heart;
Wounded in the mortal strife,
When I, like a stricken hart,
From the turmoil and the shock,
Seek defense by God's own hand;
Seek the shadow of a rock
In a weary, weary land.

Often sin appears to tread
Virtue 'neath unholy feet.
"Like a green bay tree they spread"
Who sit in the scorner's seat.
But, my God, when sinners mock,
Safely then I take my stand
In the shadow of a rock,
In a weary, weary land.

W. C. MARTIN.

The Wise Mother's Son.

AS an illustration of the influence of a mother on her children's character, this beautiful story is related by the Chinese classical teachers to the youth of that nation:

A woman weaver lived about 2200 years ago. She was a widow, and maintained herself and her only son by weaving, and was very anxious that this son should become industrious and learned, and grow up virtuous and good. Their home was near a cemetery, and the little boy often watched the funeral ceremonies, and heard the wailing at the tombs, all of which he learned to repeat with a good deal of ability. His mother thought he would grow up sad and melancholy, so she decided to move away from the neighborhood of the cemetery. She did so; but on getting into the new quarters found that her immediate neighbor carried on the trade of a butcher, and her son took interest in watching him slaughter animals. "This," she said, "will not do; my son will grow up cruel; I must move again."

This time she found the new home adjoined a school and a temple. The boy was sent to school, the mother doing all she could to encourage him to persevere in his studies. One day, however, he felt tired and indolent, left school during school hours, and came home. His mother was weaving as he entered the house, and looking surprised and grieved, without saying a word, she seized a knife and cut her web right across. The boy was alarmed, and asked his mother the meaning of such a rash act. She replied: "The piece of calico I weave is made by patiently putting thread upon thread, inch upon inch, foot upon foot, till the whole becomes a complete piece. Your future is built up by putting moment to moment, hour to hour, day to day, month to month, but by indolence you have spoiled the whole, just as I spoiled my piece of calico by cutting the web."

The boy was much affected, prayed his mother's pardon, and she never had to reproach him again. He diligently applied himself to study, and eventually became the great sage, Mencius, who is generally placed next to Confucius, but as a philosopher was in many respects superior to him.

A Step-mother Speaks.

I am a step-mother and I can truly say that, having lost a dear son in his early consecrated manhood, stricken down early in his college course, and having an only child left, my step-daughter, a young lady beautiful with the beauty of goodness, is just as dear as either of my own. I have cheerfully furnished money when needed for education or travel, and have watched her progress with much delight. On her part she has been dutiful and loving, and more self-sacrificing than I could ask. Few own mothers and daughters are as happy in each other as we are. The responsibility has been in some respects much greater, and I have the deepest sympathy with step-mothers, many of whom have tried just as hard to win and hold the love of their charges, with far different results.

CHRIST-LIFE

CHRISTIAN HERALD

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

Nicholas Lloyd, a wealthy financier, whose whole mind runs on money-making schemes, is living with his wife and his daughter Alice at his beautiful country-house. An only son, Stephen, has become estranged from his father, and spends most of the time at sea. Among Stephen's acquaintances are John McAslin and his sister Jessie, the former a noble-hearted young lawyer and writer with progressive ideas concerning social and moral reforms, and the latter a bright, warm-hearted girl, who is greatly admired by Stephen. Mrs. Lloyd is a woman of emotional nature and almost worships her boy with whom her husband has quarrelled. She is wealthy in her own right, but is a mere cipher at home, Nicholas Lloyd ruling all with an iron hand. He is ambitious to make a brilliant match for Alice, and has already chosen for her future husband Lord Medway, a young English peer, but Mrs. Lloyd opposes the match. Before leaving on his voyage, Stephen visits his home and through his diplomatic arrangement, Jessie McAslin, with whom he is in love but who knows him by another name, is engaged as music teacher to Alice Lloyd.

At a meeting of workmen, at which a pending strike is discussed, John McAslin and Steve take very decided ground against extreme measures and an encounter occurs between Steve and a bully in which the latter is badly worsted. Mr. Lloyd, who has read some of McAslin's arguments on labor and capital in the magazines, invites him to meet a few other gentlemen equally interested in social reforms, at his residence. There, a friendly discussion occurs, and he is so struck with the native ability of the young man that he engages him as his secretary. McAslin's favorite doctrine is that all wealth should be consecrated to the highest and noblest uses, that there is no such thing as irresponsible riches, and that Christ was the true exponent, for both the ancients and moderns, of the reforms necessary for the universal betterment of social conditions.

Alice Lloyd learns to love the young reformer, and Mrs. Lloyd is awakened by his conversation, to the need of a better stewardship of her own wealth. Lord Medway urges his suit for Alice's hand, and Mr. Lloyd, on laying his proposal before his daughter, is astounded by her absolute refusal to accept the nobleman as a husband. He attempts coercion, but Mrs. Lloyd unexpectedly summons courage and confronts him with the threat to withdraw her private fortune from his business, if he persists in forcing the match, and bringing on Alice all the misery of a loveless marriage such as she herself had endured. After a stormy scene, the great financier, so long used to control in all matters, business and domestic, yields to the inevitable to avert a draft upon his resources that might involve him in financial ruin. Meanwhile, the watchful mother has noted the growing affection between her daughter and John McAslin and is pleased with the prospects of such a union. On returning from his voyage, Steve decides on marriage, and after securing Jessie's consent, visits his parents, to break to them the news of his purpose. Both Alice and Mrs. Lloyd approve of the step. On this visit, Steve learns for the first time of his mother's new awakening to the spiritual responsibilities of wealth, and he consents to act as her agent in the philanthropies she wishes to establish with her large private fortune.

Steve's Opportunity.

TEARS of rapture came into Steve's bright eyes; he thought himself the happiest man in the world. Such a noble mother! and Jessie also! There was not a king nor kaiser he would have changed places with. He could not speak for very joy, but he lifted his mother's hand and kissed it.

"You see," she continued, "it will be so nice for you to have a pretty home of your own. Jessie will like that—every good woman does—and as I shall give you a fair salary, is there anything to prevent your marriage taking place very soon? If you look at to-day's newspaper you will see that I have advertised for an agent. I intended to give him two thousand dollars a year. Will that sum satisfy you, Steve? I hope so, for your salary will come out of the money that is no longer mine—out of the money that I must use as a steward. Mr. Telford thought two thousand dollars a year a good salary for the work."

"It is more than good. I will be content with much less."

"Right, for everyone, is right. You will have a wife to support."

Jessie is very careful and prudent. She has been used, not only to making money but to saving it. You would wonder if you knew how economical she is."

"We shall see, we shall see, Steve. The next thing is your home. You must take that from me. I want you to have a pretty home. A great deal of happiness depends upon it. Steve, my boy, I do hope you are going to be happy at last!"

As she spoke she opened her desk, took out her bank book and wrote a check for a thousand dollars. "A mother does not marry her only son every day," she said with a pleasant laugh. "I may never have this good opportunity again, Steve, so you must let me humor my whim now."

Here is a one thousand dollar check. It will furnish such a house as you need to begin life with." Then she walked to her toilet table and lifted a handsome ring. "Give that to Jessie, with my love, and go at once, Steve, for I want you to begin work this afternoon."

"Darling mother! How can I thank you?"

"Your happy face thanks me. Your loving heart thanks me. Now I will give you my orders for this afternoon, and then you will not have to come back here to-day. We must have an office, Steve, a pleasant room in some building where you can put a safe for cash and papers, a place to which all this mail can be sent, where people on business can call and see you, where contracts can be made and signed, and so on. Hitherto I have used Mr. Telford's office, but it is no longer proper or convenient, so this afternoon rent a room and buy a safe and such office furniture as is necessary—no extravagance, mind—and then tomorrow at ten o'clock report to me."

"Cannot I answer that pile of letters for you before I go, mother?"

"Not this morning. You are longing to tell Jessie what a good thing has come to you. Go, and be happy with her for an hour or two. To-day I will do this part of your work. And now I must begin at once, so good-bye. I shall see you every day now, Steve. What a pleasure that will be. One moment—have you seen your father?"

"Not yet. Do you wish me to see him?"

"Yes. I think I would say a kind and cheerful word to him."

He loves you as well as he can love anyone, Steve; and he has not been quite himself lately. Changes that even I can notice have taken place lately. He ought to give himself a holiday—a long holiday—and he will not. He ought to see a good physician and he will not."

"What changes have you noticed?"

"A month ago he was so eccentric, and did things that puzzled all of us. Twice this summer he has had extraordinary fits of extravagance. His egotism and boasting about Lord Medway's attentions to Alice are very unlike your father, or else I have never known the man. He has also assumed a slowness of speech, which I suppose he thinks adds to his dignity, but it does not. However, Alice says he is much better the last three weeks, so do not say anything to irritate him."

"I will not. Shall I tell him of my intended marriage?"

"I would. For some reason he seems to have taken a great liking to the McAslins."

"What of my engagement in your affairs?"

"Do not speak of that. We must wait a little, a favorable opportunity will come."

Steve had walked very slowly and heavily up stairs to the interview with his mother

It was over, and he came down them as if he was treading on air. Such good fortune seemed almost incredible. Nothing that he could have planned for himself, would have been half so consonant with the peculiar necessities of his nature and ideas. And he could not help reflecting, how all summer while he was apparently drifting, his mother had been unconsciously working for him while she had thought herself altogether working for others. But not until that very morning—scarce half-an-hour before his visit—had it struck her that the needed overseer and agent might well be her own son. Thus it is always in life ordered by God. We build, and we build far better than we know or intend, for the master's hand is invisibly directing and controlling events, to far nobler ends than our own wisdom or foresight had intended.

Swift as light these thoughts passed through Steve's mind, they induced a momentary fervor, and he did not perceive the opening of the parlor door until his father came slowly out of it into the hall. They met at the foot of the stairs, and Steve said in the cheerful voice of one who has a heart at ease.

"Good morning, father."

"You! Where have you come from?"

"From the Baltic and the Mediterranean."

"From Jupiter and dreamland! Tut, sir!

MR. LLOYD STOPPED AND BOUGHT A PAPER.

And pray where are you going to now?"

"I am going to stay in New York."

"Tired of roaming at last?"

"Yes. I am going to be married."

"Tip-top folly! How are you going to support a wife? Whoever the girl may be I am sorry for her. You must know that she marries you because you are my son. She thinks you will have plenty of money."

"She does not know I am your son. She is marrying me because she loves me."

"I hope you are going to make her a decent living."

"I hope so."

"Very well then, go down to the office with me this morning. I have to hire a stranger to do the work you ought to be glad to do for me. What are hesitating about?"

"The old trouble, father. You know all about it. Why should we open that question again? There are so many things we can talk pleasantly on."

"There is only one question between you and me. We must settle that question first. Come, Steve. I have never let anyone sit at your old desk. I always thought you would come back to it."

"I can never go back to my old desk, father. I wish you would put it out of your sight and your memory. Besides, I have at present some other work, which will take up the whole of my time for now not how long. Father, forgive me that I cannot be what you would like me to be."

"Then whatever did you come here for?" And a torrent of passionate words fell from his trembling lips, after the question—words that shocked and shamed and that fell like stones on Steve's heart. He was confounded by the anger he had raised, and as he opened his mouth to try and soothe the wrathful man, Alice appeared. She stood between her father and Steve, though it was some displeasure she asked her brother why he came home, if he had nothing disagreeable news to tell, and nothing to do but put his sick father in a passion."

So quickly does trouble tread on the heels of joy! So quickly does disappointment shadow the glory of hope! Steve had to suffer both, for when he reached home he found that Jessie had unexpectedly received a visit from an old friend whose home was in Princeton, and who had gone back with her for a couple of days. There was a loving little note for Steve but the written words did not atone the delicious expectations that had their first grace in anger and delay. However, Steve accepted the circumstance which he could not alter as cheerfully possible, for many experiences had taught him how often

All earthly pleasures vanish thus:

So little hold of them have we,
That we from them, or from our us,
May in a moment ravished be.

It was well that he had his mother's commissions to attend to. They occupied him all the afternoon, and in the evening he looked forward to John's society. He intended then to reveal his real name and position, and prove that he had deserved the confidence and friendship that had been so freely given him. But John did not return to dinner, and Steve, remembering his father's anger, concluded that the business and correspondence of the day had been delayed by it. If it had been for the ring and the check in his pocket, he might have doubted the honesty of the morning, so quickly and absolutely had they been dashed by disappointment. He even fancied that Mr. and Mrs. McAslin were less friendly than usual so much so that he had not the heart to do them anything, and was glad to recall a trades' meeting in whose affairs he had expressed an interest. It was unlikely he had gone there directly from Mr. Lloyd's, and pretty certain that he would visit the men sometime during the evening.

In some respects these suppositions were correct. John had been detained. Mr. Lloyd had found it impossible to attend to business with his usual devotion. In spite of himself, his interview with Steve troubled him. He could not feel his son's happy face and cordial glances of manner, nor yet his own brutal interruption of their discussion. A vague feeling that he was "not master of himself" at the time made him tremble with apprehension. He clung to John and talked to him of many things apart from their ordinary affairs, and when he finally rose to leave Mr. Lloyd said he would walk down the avenue with him.

A newsboy passed them immediately, calling "Extra! The Great Strike! Extra!" and Mr. Lloyd stopped and bought a paper. "What folly!" he said. "The mice might as well rise against the rats as labor against capital. These men are only consuming their savings and the funds of their union."

"It will be a long strike," said he thoughtfully.

"All the worse for the strikers then," answered Mr. Lloyd. "Their struggle lies in the beginning of a fight and exhausted as it proceeds. The emigrants most the breaking up of contracts and the suspension of work, but as soon as the first shock is over he makes new arrangements, and the strike's course does not trouble him. He has suffered the worst and can bide his time. You know what bidding their time means to the strikers?"

"It means hunger, and sickness and trouble of every kind," said John.

"And when you have talked till you are tired, the last meaning of it all is—the attack capital is to diminish wages; but or wrong, that is the end of it."

Home Talks with Mothers and Daughters.

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

MIRIAM'S GOLDEN GIFT.

MIRIAM ARROWSMITH knocked twice before she was admitted at the door of the house in Hester Street to which she was sent that bitter Sunday afternoon. The door opened cautiously, and the grizzled face of a man—a man with a hunted, desperate look—peered anxiously out.

"Your bell is broken," said Miriam. "I was afraid I could not make you hear. He told me at the settlement that Esther Ivanovitch lived here, and I have come to see her. Esther is ill, I believe."

"Yes," the man answered, opening the door to let her enter, "my little Esther is sick. Come in, if you are a friend."

"I am a friend," Miriam replied with her rare sunny smiles. "Do not be afraid of me. Take me to your little girl."

"I was a large and gloomy house, but everything was scrupulously clean, the floor on the halls shone, the stairs were carpeted. The Ivanovitchs lived on the floor above the shops, which on Sunday were closed. Other families occupied the rooms above them; there were sounds of life, children crying, a parrot chattering, the monotonous tones of a half-illiterate reader, droning out a story from a paper to an audience who hurried in and read faster. These blending sounds were so familiar to Miriam as she followed her guide to the room where Esther lay.

"The thin, furtive face of the father of the child, and the sallow countenance of the mother, who came forward to meet the visitor, did not prepare one for the splendid beauty of Esther herself. She lay on her pillows, a radiant vision, her soft eyes under a cloud of golden hair, her beautiful arched brows, her upturned bow of a mouth, suggesting the vision that ever occurred to a painter's fancy. Esther Ivanovitch might have been a reverent artist of the Middle Ages, for his ideal of the Virgin.

"The parents knew very little English, but when Esther was well she went to the public school, and she spoke the tongue of her land with ease, and with a singular sweetness of accent.

"Dear lady, dear lady!" she exclaimed, sitting herself on one elbow, and looking down to see her friend, that her face was as beautiful as a picture. "You have come! you have come! Dr. Marie said you would come, and now have. You are here! Oh! praise our great God. You will sing for me, dear lady, and that will make me well!"

"Ay, but Esther!" remonstrated the mother.

"Yes," insisted Esther, "she will sing for me by myself."

"Doctor Marie told me you wanted me to sing," said the lady, simply, "and that is what I came for. And you will soon be well. The doctor told me so. There is no great trouble, only weakness, and you must have good food and rest, and the doctor is to have work to-morrow, and all is going right for you."

"The God of Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob bless you!" said the man in the doorway, but he spoke in a language Miriam did not understand. All the same, the blessing of him that was ready to perish upon her like the gentle dew.

Miriam stood by the one window of the room, the sunset light falling upon her face, its dark hair bound around it like a crown. She had thrown off her jacket when she entered, and she now sat on her bed. She could sing better about them. Her hands lightly interlaced, she opened her mouth, and out came the splendid golden flood of melody. Anything more sympathetic, more thrilling, more tender, more divine than that magnificent contralto, cannot be imagined. The people who heard her were no mean critics, for though poor as the poor, they had been brought up in a loving town at home, and good mothers had given them their best for less than the price of a loaf of bread.

All over the house doors opened, men and women and children stood hushed in the hall-ways; the stairs were crowded with listeners. And Miriam sang on:

Once I thought to sit so high
In the palace of the sky;
Now I thank God for his grace
If I may fill the lowest place.
While I stumble, halt and blind,
Lo, he waiteth to be kind.
Bless me soon, or bless me slow,
Except he bless, I will not go.

The audience did not know what her words meant, but they felt the passion of her sincerity, and her sparkling music held them. She sang again and again: at last she stopped, put on her things, stooped down and kissed Esther, and was gone. She had slipped a little silken purse into the mother's hand, and given the father a note, telling him where to find "a steady job" to-morrow. Passing down the stairway and into the lighted street, she left behind her those who had been visited by an angel.

That was a desperately hard time for the poor. So many mills had shut down. So many shops had reduced the number of their employees. The crowd of girls who, a Sunday later, thronged a room where some King's Daughters were to hold a meeting, had faced hunger and cold and distress and temptation. Many of them were in great straits, for to be out of work in winter is a terrible thing in homes where every penny must be counted and looked at, and turned over before it can be spent. Girls came to that meeting who had breakfasted and dined on crackers and cold water; they were respectably clad, for somehow, whatever they go without, these young women and their mothers who manage for them, keep the decent frock and jacket for the street. But many of them looked poor and pale, and the dark shadows under their eyes told a tale of suffering and want.

The sweet-faced woman who led the meeting was no stranger to these girls, for whom the King's Daughters had opened a pleasant room in this crowded part of the town, a room with beautiful pictures, plants and a piano. It was always warmed in the day-time and lighted in the evening, and the girls could come here and invite their friends. They had no privacy in their own homes, but in this refuge from the outside world they might sit down and have a cozy, uninterrupted chat whenever they chose.

My heart looks up to thee

was the hymn which the leader gave out, and it was sung with fervor. There were prayers and addresses, and then:

"Miss Arrowsmith is here and will sing for us," said Mrs. Lansing, with the air of one who knew that she was announcing a treat. She was not mistaken. A little thrill ran through the crowded ranks, one girl took another by the hand, they waited, hushed, and happy, forgetful of want, cold, and hunger. Was not Miriam going to sing for them?

"I wish you had heard her that day," "The Home-land oh! The Home-land," never seemed to me so full of heaven, so sweet, so beckoning, as when Miriam sang of its beauty, and her voice was made. I think, to carry to the throne the exultant prayer in "Nearer my God to Thee!"

"What is Miriam doing with her voice?" was asked one afternoon at a tea. For Miriam Arrowsmith was born to the purple and her home was a palace where she was idolized as a dear and cherished daughter.

"Singing in the slums, I hear," answered the friend, indifferently. "I think it is a shame! She might have had a magnificent career; such a voice is given to only two or three in a generation."

"And she has had such splendid advantages," said the other. "Lessons in New York at eight dollars an hour, lessons in Paris, and in Vienna,—what can she be thinking of? Is she a fanatic? The Arrowsmiths were always a little odd, you know."

"They are singularly unworldly," interpolated a listener, who knew the ladies intimately enough to speak with freedom. "Miriam is like all her people, she has an intense enthusiasm for humanity. She has pity and hope, and love for her kind, and she is using her golden gift 'to serve the present age.' I've no doubt the angels count her in among their best helpers."

MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

THE FIRST MARCH OF THE WOMAN'S TEMPERANCE CRUSADE.

A YOUNG boy of sixteen, the son of Judge Thompson, of Hillsboro, O., came home one night after listening to a lecture on temperance by Dr. Dio Lewis of Boston. Finding his mother still up, he related to her that in the course of his remarks, Dr. Lewis had told how his own mother and several of her good Christian friends had united in, with and for the liquor-sellers of his native town, until they had given up their soul-destroying business, and then had said, "Ladies, you might do the same thing in Hillsboro, if you had the same faith." Afterwards he put the matter to vote and more than fifty of the women stood up, pledging themselves to make the effort.

"And now, mother," said the enthusiastic boy, "they have got you into business, for you are on a committee to do some work at the Presbyterian Church in the morning at nine o'clock, and then the ladies want you to go out with them to the saloons."

Judge Thompson had that evening returned from court in another county, and, being very tired, was resting on the sofa, and the mother and her son, supposing that he was asleep, had been speaking in an undertone; but as the boy spoke about his mother going to the saloons, the Judge suddenly roused up and exclaimed, "What tomfoolery is all that!" The boy slipped out of the room and went to bed, while Mrs. Thompson assured her husband that she would not be led into any foolish act by Dio Lewis, or anybody else. After he had relaxed into a milder mood, though continuing to scoff at the whole plan as "tomfoolery," the good woman ventured to remind him that the men had been in the "tomfoolery" business a long time, and suggested that it might be "God's will" that the women should now take their part.

The next morning after breakfast, when they were gathered in the sitting-room, the boy came up, and laying his hand on his mother's shoulder, inquired, "Mother, are you not going over to the church this morning?" As she hesitated and doubtless showed in her countenance that she was greatly perplexed, the boy said, "But, my dear mother, you know you have to go." Then her daughter, who was sitting on a stool at her side, leaned over in a most tender manner, and, looking up in her face, said, "Don't you think you will go?"

While this conversation had been going on, Judge Thompson had been walking the floor in silence. Suddenly he stopped, and placing his hand upon the family Bible that lay upon his wife's work-table he said, "Children, you know where your mother goes to settle all vexed questions. Let us leave her alone," going out of the room as he spoke, the children following him. Mrs. Thompson turned the key in the lock and was in the act of kneeling down to pray, when she heard a gentle tap on the door. Upon opening it, she found her daughter with her Bible open and the tears coursing down her cheeks as she said, "I opened to this, mother: it must be for you."

She immediately left the room, and her mother sat down to read with new insight the wonderful message of promise in the 146th Psalm.

Doubting no longer what her duty was, she at once went to the Presbyterian Church, where quite a congregation had already gathered. She was at once unanimously chosen as the president, Mrs. General McDowell, vice-president; and Mrs. D. K. Finner, secretary of the unique work which they were to perform.

They drew up appeals to druggists, saloon-keepers, and hotel proprietors. Then Dr. McSurely, the Presbyterian minister, who had up to this time occupied the chair, called upon the new president to come forward and take her place. She tried to get up; but having never done any public work, her limbs refused to act, and she sat still. Wise Dr. McSurely looked around at the men and said, "Brethren, I see that the ladies will do nothing while we remain; Let us adjourn, leaving this new work with God and the women."

After the men had filed out and the door was closed behind them, new strength seemed to come to Mrs. Thompson; and she walked forward to the minister's table, took the large Bible, and, opening it, told the story of the morning in her own home. After she had tearfully read the psalm and commented on it, she called upon Mrs. McDowell to lead in prayer. Now, Mrs. McDowell, though a good Christian woman for many years, had never in all her life heard her own voice in prayer; but she prayed that morning as though Isaiah's "coal of fire" had unsealed her lips.

As they rose from their knees, Mrs. Thompson asked Mrs. Cowden, the wife of the Methodist minister, to lead in the singing of the old hymn, "Give to the winds thy fears;" and turning to the rest of the women she said, "As we all join in singing this hymn, let us form in line, two by two, the small women in front, leaving the tall ones to bring up the rear, and let us at once proceed to our sacred mission, trusting alone in the God of Jacob." As they marched out through the door of the church into the street, they were singing these prophetic words:

Far, far above thy thought,
His counsels shall appear,
When fully he the work hath wrought
That caused thy needless fear.

And thus was begun the first march of that mighty crusade that proved to be a divine contagion that has spread to the ends of the earth.

Roads in Palestine.

Good roads and highways are now to be found in Palestine, and travel is thus rendered more difficult every year. Even the old Roman highways are now so uneven as to render traveling extremely hazardous, says a writer in The Treasury. This is due to the government, for should there be a call for anything better by a "Good Roads Association" of that portion of the Orient, the tax robbery would date from the hour of the commencement of work on such improvements. The Turk does not really want improvements, for it was difficult to persuade him that the railroad already started would aid the traffic, and development of trade. After the failure of a German engineer to perfect a scheme for a line of railway connecting Jerusalem with the Mediterranean, as also the failure of an Egyptian capitalist, permission was really obtained from the Turkish government in 1888 for the construction of the railway which was completed in 1892. This line is about fifty-five miles in length and actually has over one hundred and seventy bridges.

Two other railways have since been started in ancient Palestine, and it is not unlikely that the visitor to the Holy Land in the very near future will find travel less wearisome, though not likely to give the Bible-time impression that the former antiquated mode of transit must have conveyed to the minds of their predecessors.

God News for Asthma Sufferers.
We are glad to announce that the Kola plant, discovered on the Congo River, West Africa, has proved itself a sure cure for Asthma, as much as the time. We have the testimony of doctors, the gospel, doctors, business men and other all speaking of the marvelous curative power of this new discovery. Hon. L. G. Clute, of Iowa, writes that he could not lie down at night from Asthma, and the Kola Plant cured him at once. Rev. G. Ellsworth Stump, pastor of the Congregational Church at Newell, Iowa, tells us that he has been a sufferer from Asthma for many years, and gives similar testimony. To verify our beyond doubt its wonderful curative power, Kola Importing Co., No. 1164 Broadway, New York, will send a large case of the Kola used free by mail to every reader of The Christian Herald who suffers from any form of Asthma. In return they only ask that you tell your neighbors of it when cured yourself. This is the best and we advise all sufferers from Asthma to try the Case. It costs you nothing.
Asthma can accomplish wonders. Take the Kola plant even if you suffer with a headache. Regularity and persistence in the use of this medicine will have its reward.

Peter Moller,
who in 1853 revolutionized the whole system of Cod Liver Oil manufacture by the introduction of the "steam process," has now introduced a new method which is as superior to the steam process as that was to the old and crude methods. By the new process the Oil is kept free from impurities, and does not come into contact with the atmosphere at any time during the manufacture. Moller's

THE WAY OF DARKNESS.

Suggestions on the B. Y. P. U. Topic for March 21. Prov. 4: 13-19.

LIGHT and darkness are ever the symbols respectively of righteousness and wickedness. The wicked man stumbles and falls, but the righteous has light on his path and he climbs toward the light. The way of darkness has many paths, and none is so crowded as the path which has been chosen for this week's special consideration. The drunkard's path is in Egyptian darkness, which is so dark that it may be felt. The light that quenched him by the potatoes that he ate of reason and prudence, becomes darkness. Neither from God's throne nor from conscience, nor from knowledge and experience does any ray of light fall on the dangerous path. It begins in the weakness of self-indulgence, and it leads to the darkness of eternal night. As we see of the blind, groping victims, we realize that in this, as in all other ways, the spirit of man is the candle of the Lord.

From God's children the light shines on that gloomy path. Too blind and blind to find his way into the some friendly beam from one in whom God has lighted the candle of his life, may come to the victim and guide his footsteps out of the shadow. By example, by self-denial, by pleading, the man may be beckoned toward the light of safety. This mission of rescue and redemption is the Christian's sacred trust.

A Prominent Physician Writes.

SPOTSWOOD, N. J., Aug. 3, 1896.
Messrs. McKesson & Robbins:
Dear Sirs:—Please send me, by mail, four more bottles of Tartarilithine Tablets (10c each.)

I will also here state, in justice, that this is the most welcome remedy that has come into my hands since my beginning of the practice of medicine. It has given me, in every case of rheumatism in which I have used it, the happiest kind of results. I have used discretion, perhaps even more than necessary, in its employment; that it be given to patients whom I believed required such a remedy or preparation; but these are just the kind that refuse to yield to ordinary treatment, old chronic cases of gouty diathesis, where there is a tendency to calcareous deposits, etc. These are the most troublesome patients in my practice to give what might fairly be termed good results. Now these have been the very kind in which I have been using Tartarilithine with the very happiest results to patients and myself. Many valuable remedies come daily to our aid, but this has been the most welcome one to me thus far.

Yours very truly,

"CURES BY INHALATION."

PENNSYLVANIA COMPANY—WESTERN DIVISION,
Office of the Superintendent,
C. D. Law, Supt.

FORT WAYNE, IND., Nov. 3, 1895.

DEAR SIR:—In March last I was suffering from a severe catarrhal cold. My right ear was almost totally deaf, and the ringing in it was exceedingly annoying. I purchased an outfit and commenced its use, continuing through the day as I would have opportunity. About 5 p.m. the congestion in the eustachian tube disappeared, my hearing was fully restored, and I have since had no recurrence. Since then I have, on several occasions, checked and cured bronchial colds, and I have no hesitancy in recommending it.

Very truly yours,

C. D. Law,

Guarantee. I will refund the money to all persons purchasing Booth's Pocket Inhaler Outfit anywhere in the United States, during 1897, who will say that HYOMEI has done them no good, on condition that they apply direct to the head office, 23 East 20th Street, New York City. (Signed) R. T. Booth

Hyomei is a purely vegetable antiseptic, and destroys the germs which cause disease in the respiratory organs. The air, charged with Hyomei, is inhaled at the mouth, and, after permeating the minutest air-cells, is exhaled slowly through the nose. It is aromatic, delightful to inhale, and gives immediate relief. It is highly recommended by physicians, clerical men, and thousands who have been helped and cured.

Pocket Inhaler Outfit Complete, by Mail, $1; (for foreign countries add $1.00 postage); outfit consists of pocket inhaler, a bottle of Hyomei, a dropper and directions for using. If you are still skeptical, send your address; my pamphlet shall prove that Hyomei cures. Are you open to conviction? Extra bottles of Hyomei Inhalant by mail, or at druggists, 50 cents. Hyomei Balm for all skin diseases, by mail, 25 cents. Your druggist has Hyomei or can get it for you if you insist. Don't accept a substitute. In stock at the leading wholesale drug houses of Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago, and all leading business centers.

BY SOWING THE HENDERSON LAWN GRASS SEED

YOU CAN OBTAIN IN FROM SIX TO EIGHT WEEKS

A BEAUTIFUL LAWN

IN WHOSE RICH GREEN VELVETY DEPTHS
THE LAWNS OF OLD ENGLAND

HAVE THUS FAR FOUND THEIR ONLY RIVAL.

The English lawn is the ideal one, and yet the varieties of grasses used in England are worthless in this country. So for years we have been experimenting, and, as a result, we now offer in The "Henderson" Lawn Grass Seed the best lawn mixture in the world for our American climate. It not only forms a rich, thick turf within a few weeks, but, rooting deeply, it always withstands the severest drought. Made up of the various grasses that flourish during the different months, its peculiar, rich, deep emerald effect is always present. Rest assured if the directions sent with every order are carefully followed, you will not only be delighted with the result, but, if you have ever used sod, will be surprised that you ever did so. Even when sods can be had for nothing, their preparation and laying make them more expensive than our Lawn Seed, to say nothing of the appearance of a lawn or plot, forever bristling "with all sorts and conditions of" weeds.

In every package we send complete directions "How to Make a Lawn," and whether you want a large lawn or a modest dooryard plot, we can supply the quantities needed, which are: for making new lawns, five bushels per acre; for renewing same area, from one to two bushels. For a plot 15 x 20, or 300 square feet, one quart is sufficient; for renewing same area use one pint.

Price, 25 cts. per qt.; $1.50 per peck; $5.00 per bushel of 32 qts. If by mail, add 5 cents to quart price for postage.

The best way to remit is by Express Money Order, P. O. Money Order or Bank Draft. When more convenient, postage-stamps or silver will be accepted.

With every order from this advertisement we will send FREE that superb horticultural work of the century.

CHINESE LANTERN PLANT.

Most Ornamental Window or Garden Plant Known, and a Delicious Fruit.

Treated like a Tomato it grows and fruits freely in the garden during summer, or in pots both summer and winter. It bears continually numerous large, inflated husks, much the shape of Chinese Lanterns, at first a beautiful green color, changing to a yellowish hue, then to brightest scarlet, and as they hang suspended among the foliage they present a most novel and beautiful sight. Autumn frosts do not injure it, and it is a showy garden plant until December. In each "Lantern" a fruit is borne, of large size and rich ruby color, which is most delicious for eating raw, or for cooking and preserving. Branches of Lanterns cut and dried retain their rich and brilliant colors for years and make most charming vase ornaments. Grows 18 inches high; bears abundantly all the time in any soil or climate. No other pot plant so beautiful as this. Having an enormous stock we offer strong plants for early fruiting, by mail, postpaid, guaranteed to arrive in good order, at 25 cts. each; 4 for 50 cts.; 10 for $1.00.

EIGHT Ever-blooming ROSES for 50 Cts.

An UNEQUALED COLLECTION of the very BEST ROSES.

We send one good, strong plant of each for 50 cts., by mail, postpaid. Even at our Reduced Prices for 1897, these Eight Elegant Roses, purchased separately, would cost $1.50.

MOSELLA, or NEW YELLOW SOUPERT. The New Yellow Souper Rose, MOSELLA, just introduced from Germany, is fully as hardy and equally as constant in bloom as the well-known CLOTHILDE SOUPERT, so deservedly popular. The full flowers are of the same size, but the color is white, shading in the center to apricot-yellow. It is even more prolific than the original Souper in its wondrous freedom of bloom, while the buds are more beautiful. MOSELLA is such a grand new Rose that we want every plant buyer to have at least one plant this season. Hence we purchased a large stock in Germany, and have propagated fully forty thousand plants, which we offer at 15 cts. each; 4 for 50 cts.; 9 for $1.00, postpaid. See illustration.

PINK SOUPERT. The flowers take their form from Clothilde Souper, and in color are a deep Hermosa pink. It is a continuous bloomer; each branch terminates with a cluster of flowers. Blooms splendidly in the open ground. 20 cts. each; 3 for 50 cts.; 7 for $1.00.

AUGUSTA VICTORIA. It has long, magnificent buds, and its large, perfectly double, pure white flowers are unequalled in form. 20 cts. each.

BELLE SIEBRECHT. The flowers and buds are of fine size and form, very double, sweet, and lasting; color a rare, rich shade of true, solid pink. Good, strong plants 25 cts. each; 5 for $1.00, postpaid.

BRIDESMAID. This is the most valuable of all the Tea Roses for cutting, keeping quite fresh for days. The buds are a bright, deep pink. 15 cts. each.

MADAME ABEL CHATENAY. A constant bloomer, of vigorous growth. Bud very fine, opening spirally; flowers full, of medium size; color carmine-rose, shaded with salmon. 25 cts. each; 5 for $1.00.

METEOR. The most brilliant of Hybrid Teas, producing its vivid crimson flowers all summer. 15 cts. each.

MAMAN COCHET. This most beautiful of all pink Tea Roses is also the very best for garden culture. 15 cts. each.

For 50 Cts. we will send, postpaid, all of the above eight elegant Roses. Each year we grow some of the best Roses for a similar offer, but never before have we been able to give such A GRAND COLLECTION FOR FIFTY CENTS.

NEW ROSE,—Souvenir du President CARNOT.

Admired by everybody; it grows in favor daily. It has all the good qualities, being a remarkably strong, quick grower, extremely healthy, and a constant bloomer. It produces long, stiff stems, with handsome foliage; the color is an exquisite sea-shell pink, with the edge of the petals ivory-white. The blooms are of large and perfect shape; it is THE ROSE of the year. It has taken more Medals and Certificates of Merit than any other variety ever introduced in this country. A perfectly hardy garden Rose. Good, strong plants, price 35 cts. each; 4 for $1.00, postpaid.

In Ancient Jaffa's Rocky Harbor.

A Picturesque Port, full of Perils for Mariners, Yet the Chief Landing-place in Palestine—The City's Great Antiquity and Many Biblical Associations—The House of "Simon the Tanner."

JAFFA, the seaport of Jerusalem, has a history that antedates written records by many centuries, and reaches far back into the past. Pliny, the historian, Ma, Sir John Maundeville, and others, assert that it was a port of consequence in antediluvian times; Jephthah declares that it was founded by the Phoenicians; Rabbinical writers claim that it was named after Jethet, and classical geographers trace its foundation back to the furthest antiquity, when it was named after Jia, the daughter of Æolus. It was the one great Passengers and baggage are taken ashore in row-boats. These boats are skilfully piloted through the surf and past the rocky ledges. Our illustration on this page—the view being taken from the shore, looking seaward—affords an idea of the character of Jaffa's harbor and the inconveniences and perils of disembarking there.

Many a splendid vessel has been caught in stormy seas and dashed to pieces against those ugly black rocks in Jaffa harbor. The ocean's bed there is strewn with the wreckage of fleets and covered with the bones of lovers of the sacred Scriptures. Around it the wars of Pompey, the Maccabees, Franks, Saracens, and Crusaders have raged. It was Jonah's port of shipment on his memorable voyage, and it was to Jaffa that Hiram, king of Tyre, despatched his Lebanon cedar for the building of the Temple. On the south side of the venerable city and almost at the ocean's edge, stands the dwelling which tradition declares to be the house of Simon the Tanner, with whom the Apostle Peter lodged while in that city. (Acts 9: 43). When the proprietor of this val and commercial centre of Palestine in Solomon's time and has so remained up to the present day. When the ocean traveler is nearing the coast of Palestine, the first point of land he sees is that immediately off the rocky harbor of Jaffa. It is one of the poorest of harbors to be found on any coast. No ship can come to her moorings alongshore, for the shallow bay is full of sharp, jagged rocks, that would tear any vessel to pieces, as she could not find sufficient depth of water; consequently, vessels stopping at Jaffa are compelled to ride at anchor, out in the roadstead, countless victims. Roman war galleys, Crusader fleets, Syrian and Egyptian naval and merchant vessels have left their naked skeletons on those adamant reefs. In a single storm, some eight hundred years ago, twenty-three ships were there driven to destruction on the rocks and nearly a thousand dead were washed up on the stony beach. Any other government than that of Turkey would, long ere this, have cleared away the deadly obstructions from the ancient harbor, and made it a port of comparative safety.

There are many associations that make Jaffa dear to journal went to Palestine in 1889-90, he visited the house, and ascended to the roof, from which the Apostle saw the miraculous vision. Even at the present time, the building, though now almost a ruin, is held in great veneration by Moslems, as well as Christians, and one of the rooms is set apart by the Mohammedans as a place of prayer, in memory, as one of their legends declares, "of the Lord Jesus having once asked for a meal, whereupon a laden table came down from heaven." Jaffa was also the home of Tabitha and here took place the baptism of the first Gentile household.

FORETELLING THE WEATHER.

How the Signal Service Gathers the Material for its Daily Predictions—A Visit to the New York Weather Bureau.

ALTHOUGH the Weather Bureau is still a comparatively new branch of the public service, it is one in which all classes are personally interested and which has already demonstrated its great value and usefulness to almost every branch of business throughout the country. Its daily forecasts are universally read and appreciated. It is not to the average citizen, however, who only glances at the weather report in his newspaper to learn whether he must take his umbrella with him when he sets out for the business of the day, that the work of the bureau appeals most strongly. The interests of thousands of farmers, stock-raisers, fruit-growers, sea-faring men, fishermen, and others, whose calling depends largely upon the weather, consult the reports as a matter of business. Long before the arrival of a great gale, snow-storm, blizzard, or cold wave, they are on guard of its approach, and take the criticism is unavoidable, perhaps, where a territory so vast is covered and interests so varied have to be served. But even these fault-finders are not blind to the valuable services it renders in the great emergencies already referred to, and especially in foretelling the devastating storms that occur at the change of every season, and the dreaded tornados and cyclones of mid-summer. Every year shows an increase in the efficiency of the Bureau. Established in 1871, it has now nearly 160 stations scattered over the United States, with a central office at Washington, D. C. The Bureau is under the Department of Agriculture, and its official chief is Willis L. Moore, a gentleman of high scientific attainments, and finely qualified for the position.

Observations are taken twice each day, at 8 a.m. and 8 p.m., Eastern time. Each station is equipped with the necessary instruments, and the observations are telegraphed to the Chief Observer at Washington, who, mapping out the whole on a chart, is enabled to trace the course of incipient storms of wind or rain, waves of cold or heat, and cyclonic disturbances, to observe the direction in which they are traveling at the moment, and to indicate their probable path, as well as their intensity or velocity, and the extent of territory likely to be affected. Even before the birth of a storm, if the premonitory conditions are noted, the observer is enabled to issue a timely warning of the approaching disturbance, and precautions are taken for the safety of life and property accordingly.

Next in importance to the central office of the Bureau in Washington is the New York Weather Station, which is situated on the top floor of the lofty Manhattan Life building. Here, under the management of Official Forecaster, Elias

B. Dunn, observations are made and recorded which are of interest to a very large section of our Continent. Mr. Dunn's offices are fitted up with an array of instruments of the most delicate character, and apparently so complicated in their mechanism as to bewilder the unscientific visitor. All the forecasts are based on official telegraphic information from many points, in various directions. If rain, wind, or snow, blowing from a certain quarter, is reported as prevailing at a certain point 100 miles away from New York and in the direction of that city, it is reasonably certain that, with a ten-mile an hour wind, it will reach the metropolis within ten hours. But, en route, the storm may be diverted, and made to travel in another direction, and the observer must watch for such signs as would indicate such a diversion. This is a simple case, however; there are a hundred other contingencies to be considered and each season has its own peculiar barometric and thermometric features. He must take into account not only the wind's velocity and direction, but the temperature, the humidity, the many sudden atmospheric changes that are incessantly going on, summer and winter; and constant familiarity with the infinite variety of causes operating to produce changes, makes it almost a second nature for the skilled observer to detect great atmospheric disturbances long before they have attained their maximum force, and many hours before their arrival at the point of prediction. Perched in his lofty lookout, Forecaster Dunn commands a view of a great area of land and ocean space, but it must be remembered that there are no Signal Stations at sea, consequently his position is a peculiarly difficult one. His principal instruments are the telethermograph, the sunshine recorder, and the aneroid barometer (which shows the atmospheric pressure) and the anemometer, which registers the wind velocity. The aneroid barometer, which is used instead of the ordinary mercurial thermometer, is a small box from which almost all the air has been exhausted. The outside air presses on the top of the box and causes the delicate machinery attached to it to register the exact pressure. The anemometer, or wind machine, looks almost like a toy affair. It consists of four small hollow hemispheres, like four orange skins, fastened one on each end of two small rods, which are perched on top of a pole and are made to revolve by the wind. At the other end of the pole, is a dial, where the revolutions of the pole are recorded. The more rapid the revolutions, the greater the speed of the wind. Rainfall, snow, and all moisture are calculated by measuring the rain that has fallen in certain vessels which are set out for the purpose. These are carefully made so as to prevent evaporation as far as possible. These instruments and appliances, inform him of the atmospheric conditions in the radius of 100 miles of his own station, and the telegraphic reports from all other stations taken in conjunction with his own observations, and mapped out carefully on the daily chart, enable him to form his conclusions as to the probable weather for the next twenty-four hours for the section reported as a whole, and especially in his own immediate vicinity.

Forecaster Dunn has now had twenty-three years experience as a weather observer, having served in that capacity at Denver, Washington, Cincinnati, and New York. One of the triumphs of the Bureau was Mr. Dunn's prediction of the great Cincinnati floods of 1883, which was given in time to enable thousands to move away and thus saved many lives and much property. He also gave ample warning of the destructive Mississippi floods of 1890, Prayer for Missionaries.

Prayer, earnest and continuous, is an obligation the church owes to the devoted men whom it has sent out to pioneer among the heathen. They have a claim on our prayers that we cannot afford to ignore. Some of them take their lives in their hands, and all of them expatriate themselves, giving up the society of their friends and the joys of home companionship, that they may tell the heathen the glad news of salvation. Their triumphs are the triumphs of the Church, their compensation the joy of winning souls. Unselfish, self-sacrificing, they go forth, the servants of the Church, to bear the banner of the cross into the enemy's country, they need our prayers and they deserve them. Their mission is ours, the service ours; our prayer for their success should be unceasing. Their hands should be strengthened, their spirits sustained by the grace for which we plead. None know better than they that it is not by might nor by power, not by their learning or eloquence that success will be achieved. The preparation of the heart is with the Lord, and it is given in answer to prayer. The missionary for whom prayer is offered will be a successful missionary, because God delights to give the blessing he needs when it is besought at his hands. Prayer for protection, for health, for courage, for tact, for comfort, are all needed, for the missionary wants them all in his self-imposed labor. We have no right to send out to a foreign field any man for whom we do not pray. Every blessing we will need comes from God, and from him alone, and to him we should go, joining our prayers with those the missionary offers that these blessings should be given.

NEW YORK AND BROOKLYN, AS VIEWED FROM THE SIGNAL SERVICE STATION TOWER.

necessary precautions to avoid loss and escape danger. Crops are housed or stacked, cattle and sheep are sheltered, vessels stay in port instead of venturing out to sea, and outdoor work that would be ruined by a storm, is so arranged that loss is avoided. As a writer has said: "It is even the great storms come, that Uncle Sam feels repaid for all the expense of keeping up the Bureau. When the blizzard is blowing in the Northwest, the Bureau hastens to warn the people of its approach. Twenty-four hours in advance, messages are sent all over the country. 'A cold wave coming' is the cry, and every one hastens to prepare for it. Stock is gathered into places of shelter, and this means a great deal, when we think of all the cattle grazing upon the Western plains; boats upon the lakes are run into harbor, railroads are ordered to keep the tracks cleared. Every one seeks shelter for himself and beast. It is estimated that in one storm alone a saving of three million dollars' worth of property was effected by the warnings of the Bureau." And this experience, repeated many times in a single season, represents only a part of the benefit derived by the public from the services of this branch of the government. If we see the saving in money and the avoidance of disaster to the whole nation in a single year, the result would be a very favorable showing indeed. It is probably no exaggeration to say that it is one of the greatest life-saving agencies ever devised by modern civilization! Of course, the Weather Bureau has its critics, who insist that much of its work is useless, and that a very small proportion of its predictions are accurate. This

HATE war! In my boyhood we may have read the biography of Alexander or of some revolutionary hero until our young heart beat high and we wished we had been born over a hundred years ago, just for the glory of striking down a Hessian. For rusty swords hung up on the ratters and bullets cut out of log houses in which they were lodged during the great strife we had unbounded admiration, or on some public day, clothed in our grandfather's soldierly accoutrements, we felt as brave as Garibaldi or Miltiades. We are wiser now, for we make a vast distinction between the poetry and the prose of war. The roll of drums and the call of bugles, and the champing of steeds foaming and pawing for the battle; a hundred thousand muskets glittering among the dancing plumes; "God Save the King" waving up from clarionets and trumpets and rung back from deep defiles or the arches of a prostrate city; distant capitals of kingdoms illuminated at the tidings; generals returning home under flaming arches and showering amaranths and the shout of empires; that is poetry. Chilled and half-blanketed, lying on the wet earth; feet sore with the march and bleeding at the slightest touch; hunger pulling on every fibre of flesh or attempting to satisfy itself with a scanty and spoiled ration; thirst licking up the dew or drinking out of filthy and trampled pool; thoughts of home and kindred far away while just on the eve of a deadly strife, where death may leap on him from any one of a hundred bayonets; the closing in of two armies, now changed to a hundred thousand maniacs; the ground slippery with blood and shattered flesh; fallen ones writhing under the hoofs of unbridled chargers maddened with pain; the dreadfulness of night that comes down when the strife is over; the struggle of the wounded ones crawling out over the corpses; the long, feverish agony of the crowded barrack and hospital, from whose mattresses the fragments of men send up their groans, the only music of carnage and butchery; desolate homes from which fathers and husbands and brothers and sons went off without giving any dying message or sending a kiss to the dear ones at home, tumbling into the soldiers' grave trench; and houses in which a few weeks before unbroken family circles rejoiced, now plunged in the great sorrows of widowhood and orphanage; that is prose.

But there is now on the earth a kingdom which has set itself up for conflicts without number. In its march it tramples no graves, it sacks no cities, it impoverishes no treasuries, it fills no hospitals, it bereaves no families. The courage and glory of Solferino and Magenta without carnage. The kingdom of Christ against the kingdom of Satan. That is the strife now raging. We will offer no armistices, we will make no treaty. Until all the revolted nations of the earth shall submit again to King Emanuel. In the name of God we will set up our banners.

Every army has its ensigns. Long before the time when David wrote the text they were in use. The hosts of Israel displayed them. The tribe of Benjamin carried a flag with the inscription of a wolf

The tribe of Dan a representation of cherubim. Judah a lion wrought into the groundwork of white, purple, crimson, and blue. Such flags from their folds shook fire into the hearts of such numbers as were in the field when Abijah fought against Jehoram, and there were twelve hundred thousand soldiers, and more than five hundred thousand were left dead on the field. These ensigns gave heroism to such numbers as were assembled when Asa fought against Zerah, and there were one million five hundred and eighty thousand troops in the battle. The Athenians carried an inscription of the owl, which was their emblem of wisdom. The flags of modern nations are familiar to you all, and many of them so inappropriate for the character of the nations they represent it would be impolitic to enumerate them. These ensigns are streamers borne on the point of a lance and on the top of wooden shafts. They are carried in the front and rear of armies. They unroll from the main-top-gallant-mast-head of an Admiral's flagship to distinguish it among other ships of the same squadron. They are the objects of national pride. The loss of them on the field is ignominious.

The three banners of the Lord's hosts are the banner of proclamation, the banner of recruit, and the banner of victory. When a nation feels its rights infringed or its honor insulted, when its citizens have in foreign climes been oppressed and no indemnity has been offered to the inhabitant of the republic or kingdom, a proclamation of war is uttered. On the top of batteries and arsenals and custom houses and revenue offices flags are immediately swung out. All who look upon them realize the fact that uncompromising war is declared. Thus it is that the Church of Jesus Christ, jealous for the honor of its Sovereign, and determined to get back those who have been carried off captive into the bondage of Satan, and intent upon the destruction of those mighty wrongs which have so long cursed the earth, and bent upon the extension of the Saviour's reign of mercy, in the name of God sets up its banner of proclamation.

The church makes no assault upon the world. I do not believe that God ever made a better world than this. It is magnificent in its ruins. Let us stop talking so much against the world. God pronounced it very good at the beginning. Though a wandering child of God, I see in it yet the Great Father's lineaments. Though tossed and driven by the storms of six thousand years, she sails bravely yet, and as at her launching in the beginning the morning stars sang together and all the sons of God shouted for joy, so at last, when coming into the calm harbor of God's mercy, she shall be greeted by the huzzas of glorified kingdoms. It is not the world against which we contend, but its transgressions. Whatever is obstinate in the will, degrading in passion, harmful in custom, false in friendship, hypocritical in profession—against all this Christ makes onset. From false profession he would tear the mask. From oppression he would snatch the rod. From pride he would rend off the plumes. From revenge he would exorcise the devil. While Christ loved the world so much he died to save it, he hates sin so well that to eradicate the last trace of its pollution he will utterly consume the continents and the oceans. At the gate of Eden the declaration of perpetual enmity was made against the serpent. The tumult roundabout Mount Sinai was only the roar and flash of God's artillery of wrath against sin. Sodom on fire was only one of God's flaming bulletins announcing hostility. Nineveh and Tyre and Jerusalem in awful ruin mark the track of Jehovah's advancement. They show that God was terribly in earnest when he announced himself abhorrent of all iniquity. They make us believe that though nations belligerent and revengeful may sign articles of peace and come to an amicable adjustment, there shall be no cessation of hostilities between the forces of light and the forces of darkness until the kingdoms of this world have become the kingdoms of our Lord. Affrighted by no opposition, discouraged by no temporary defeats, shrinking from no exposure—every man to his position, while from the top of our schools and churches and seminaries and asylums, "In the name of God we will set up our banners."

Again, it was the custom in ancient times, for the purpose of gathering armies, to lift an ensign on the top of some high hill, so that all who saw it would feel impelled to rally around it. In more modern times the same plan has been employed for the gathering of an army. Thus it is that the Church of Christ lifts its flag for recruits. The Cross of Jesus is our standard, planted on the hill of Calvary. Other armies demand that persons desiring to enter the lists of war shall be between such and such an age, lest the folly of extreme youth or the infirmity of advanced age be a clog rather than an advantage. But none are too young for Christ's regiment; none can be too old. The hand that is strong enough to bound a ball or trundle a hoop is skilled enough to fight for Christ, while many a hand trembling with old age has grasped the arrow of truth, and with a dim eye close to it, taking aim, has sent its sharp point right through the heart of the King's enemies. Many of you have long ago had your names written on the roll of celestial troops, and you like the service well, although you now bear the scars of multitudinous conflicts and can recount many a long march, and tell of siege-guns opened on you that you thought never would be spiked. But there may be some who have not yet enlisted. Your being here implies that you are seriously thinking about it, and your attention makes me hope you are only looking for the standard to be hoisted. Will you not, a hundred of you, with all the aroused enthusiasm of your nature, come bounding into the ranks, while "In the name of God we set up our banners?"

There are non-professors who have a very correct idea of what Christians ought to be. You have seen members of the Church who were as proud as Ahab and lied as badly as Ananias, and who were as foul hypocrites as Judas. You abhor all that. You say followers of Christ ought to be honorable, humble, and self-denying, and charitable, and patient, and forgiving. Amen! So they ought. Come into the kingdom of Christ, my hearer, and be just that glorious Christian that you have described. Every church has enough stingy men in it to arrest its charities, and enough proud men in it to grieve away the Holy Ghost, and enough lazy men in it to hang on behind till its wheels, like Pharaoh's chariots, drag heavily, and enough worldly men to exhaust the patience of the very elect, and enough snarly men to make appropriate the Bible warning, "Beware of dogs." If any of you men on the outside of the kingdom expect to make such Christians as that, we do not want you to come, for the church has already a million members too many of just that kind. We do not want our ranks crowded with serfs when we can have them filled with zouaves.

There are men now, as in Christ's time, possessed of seven devils. In some instances it seems as though at conversion only six of those evil spirits were cast out, while there remains still one in the heart, the devil of avarice, the devil of lust, the devil of pride. Men of the world you would be transformed and elevated by the power of the Gospel, now is time to come. It is no mean ensign lift this hour. It is a time-honored ensign. It has been in terrific battle. Dragged in the dust of a Saviour's humiliation from Bethlehem to Calvary. Rent by hell's onset, the spears of a maddened soldiery, and the hands of the men said, "Let him be crucified." With an ensign in his bleeding hand the Saviour scaled the heights of our sin. While he mounted the walls of perdition, amid its very smoke, and flame, and phemy he waved his triumph, while demons howled with defeat, and heaven

Thronged his chariot wheels
And bore him to his throne;
Then swept their golden harps and sang
The glorious work is done.

Again, when a grand victory has won, it is customary to announce flags floating from public building from trees and from the masts of ships. They are the signal for eulogy and singing and festivity. So the ensign of the Church hoists is a banner of victory. There was a time when the religion of Christ was not considered respectable. Men of learning and position frowned upon it. Governments anathematized its supporters. To be a Christian was an underling. But mark the difference. Religion has compelled the world to respect. Infidelity, in the tremendous effort it has made to crush it, has cemented its power. And there is not a single civilized nation but in its constitution, or laws, or proclamation, homage to the religion of the Cross. The war in India, when Sir Alexander Campbell found in an hour of danger the men he ordered to the field were intoxicated, and asked for the pilot whom the Christian Havelock had in his management, he said; "Call out lock's saints; they are never drunk. Havelock is always ready." That Christianity which gathered its first triumph from the fishermen's huts on the shore of Galilee, now has Samsonian strength thrown upon its shoulders and he has tried off the gates of science and power. We point not to fortresses and standing armies and navies as the defence of the Church's progress. We point to the men whom Christ has deemed by his blood. What if our army and navy-yards do not belong to the Church? We do not want then the weapons of our warfare are not of this world, but spiritual, and mighty through the pulling down of strongholds. The world and Satan have no idea of strength and heroism which God lets out against the forces of darkness. As yet they have had only one round the first regiment. The Lord of hosts will soon appear in the field at the head of his troops. I depend upon it, that God inspires the soul with a new principle in it the principle of "never give up."

We are mighty in this cause and have the help of the pious dead, sengers of salvation from high above, they visit the field. They stand ready to keep us from ignominious defeat. They go before us to encourage us in strife. The McChesnes and the Martyns and the Berrys, an uncounted multitude of them are our coadjutors. Have you heard of the Swiss tradition? The herdsmen of three great leaders of the Helvetians, though seemingly dead, are on the ground under the ground, in their dress, refreshing themselves with wine, and that if at any time the lights of their country are in danger they will immediately spring to their feet and back the enemy. May I not be thought that if ever the Church of the blessed Christ shall be threatened action by foes which seem too great strength, the Lord himself will not come to the deliverance, but those ancients who have seemed to be among the dead shall immediately hear the trumpet blast of the militant, and full-armed, spring to their old positions in the ranks of the battle cry. "More than conquerors through him that loved us." Though we have already much to engage us in the work of the world's civilization, yet we must confess that of our time has been consumed in our batteries and getting ready for conflict. We have not yet begun to fight. We have not yet begun to work. The coasts of heathendom are mission stations. They have scarcely yet begun to accomplish what they propose. It takes some time to dig the trenches, to elevate the standard and direct the guns. From what I hear, I think we are about ready now. Let but the Captain wave the signal, and the legions of celestial weaponry shall quake the dungeon of hell and sound up the thrones of heaven. Pagodas and temples shall tumble under the shock, and nations flying from their superstitions, shouting like the undisciplined worshippers of Baal. "The Lord is the God! The Lord, he is God!"

The Mohammedans, in their struggle to subjugate the world, had passages from the Koran inscribed on the blades of their swords, and we have nothing to fear if, in reaching the infidelity and malice that oppose the kingdom of Christ, we shall be glittering on our swords the words of the Lord to the giant, "I come to thee in the name of the Lord of Hosts, the God of armies of Israel whom thou has defied." Now the Church goes forth bearing the precious seed, but after awhile it will be the deaf-binding, and reaper angels shall be in the harvest home. Now it is tents of marching and exposure, but then in the ranks of prostrate iniquity and on the walls of heaven, "In the name of God we will set up our banners."

The earth sends up its long, deep groan of pain, and clanks the great chains of its bondage, and cries by the voice of sea and sky, "How long, O Lord, how long?" There was a tradition on the other side of the water that the daughter of a king was transformed into a bird of the kind that she wandered for hundreds of years over river and lake until the arrival of Christianity, and that at the stroke of the cathedral bell her spirit was freed. I counted millions of our race, by the power of sin and Satan, have been transformed into a state of wretchedness, and they wander like the poor daughter of a king, but they shall after awhile be redeemed. When the great Church of Christ shall shine in those darkened lands from its rising out of the glad tidings of the Gospel, then millions of wandering souls shall find rest in a Saviour's pity and a Saviour's love, transported from the kingdom of Satan into the kingdom of God's Son.

And by you would hardly know the era if you saw it. The world as a whole shall be as greatly improved as the individual heart by conversion. Fraud, being its trickery, will go to work for an honest living. Knavery shall begin to make righteous bargains. Passion shall give way to the control of reason. Scoffers shall be changed into worshippers, and scoffs into Bible lovers. Christ shall be on his reign on earth. Whether he shall descend onto the earth in person and establish a government at Jerusalem, I cannot say; but it will be an era of more than Augustan splendor. That is enough. Knowing this we can never despair. But we see the Church of Christ putting on her beautiful garments and arising to shine, we will say, with the enthusiasm of Oliver Cromwell, who, standing before his sin and famine-stricken soldiers at Dunbar, saw the sun rising out of the morning mist, and pointing to it with his sword, uttered a prayer which hurled his men upon the crushed foe like a sky full of thunderbolts: "Arise, O God! Let thine enemies be scattered." With the ear of faith I catch the sound of the latter-day glory. Church of Christ, unsheathe thy sword and this moment into the battle! In the name of Christ, march on! Upon every school and hospital, upon every banker's desk and merchant's counter, upon every chemist's laboratory and astronomer's tower, upon shepherd's hut and woodman's cabin, upon ship's deck and sailor's hammock, far out on the sea and high up in the mountain, before the gaze of nations, under the applauds of heaven, "In the name of God we will set up our banners."

My subject has taught you that in this contest we are not without ensigns and colors. All we want now is men to carry them. Before I sit down I must propose to each of you this great honor. Becoming a Christian is not so ignoble a thing as many have thought it. "It makes a man stoop," you say. I know it, but it is only the stoop of an heir of royalty, who on his knees is to receive a crown of dominion. We want standard-bearers in all pulpits, in all places of business,—everywhere. I do not ask you how old you are, nor how young; how weak or how strong; how dull or how sharp; nor what your home, nor who your ancestors. Without any condition, without any reserve, in the name of the God of Israel, I offer you the honor of carrying the Church's ensigns. Do not be afraid of the assaults of a world whose ranks you desert, nor of devils who will oppose you with infernal might. It were more blessed to fall here than stand anywhere else. It were more of an honor, engaged with Christ, to be trampled under foot with this army of banners, than, opposing Christ, to be buried like Edward I. in Egyptian porphyry.

You know in ancient times elephants were trained to fight, and that on one occasion, instead of attacking the enemy, they turned upon their owners and thousands were crushed under the stroke of their trunks and the mountain weight of their step. These mighty opportunities of work for Christ may accomplish great things in overthrowing the sin of the world and beating to pieces its errors, but if we do not wield them aright these very advantages will, in unguarded moments, turn terribly upon us and under their heels of vengeance grind us to powder. Rejected blessings are seven-fold curses. We cannot compromise this matter. We cannot stand aside and look on. Christ has declared it: "All who are not with me are against me." Lord Jesus, we surrender.

The prophecies intimate that there shall be before the destruction of the world be one great battle between truth and unrighteousness. We shall not probably see it on earth. God grant that we may see it, bending from the battlements of heaven. On the side of sin shall be arrayed all forms of oppression and cruelty, led on by infamous kings and generals. The votaries of Paganism, led on by their priests. The subjects of Mohammedism, following the command of their sheiks. And gluttony and intemperance and iniquity of every phase shall be largely represented on the field. All the wealth and splendor and power and glory of wickedness shall be concentrated on that one decisive spot, and maddened by ten thousand previous defeats, shall gather themselves up for one last, terrible assault. With hatred to God for their cause and blasphemy for the battle-cry, they spread out over the earth in square beyond square, and legion beyond legion, while in some overhanging cloud of blackness foul spirits of hell watch this last struggle of sin and darkness for dominion.

Scattered by the blasts of Jehovah's nostrils, plunder, and sin, and Satanic force shall quit the field. As the roar of the conflict sounds through the universe all worlds shall listen. The air shall be full of wings of heavenly cohorts. The work is done, and in the presence of a world reclaimed for the crown of Jesus, and amid the crumbling of tyrannies and the defeat of Satanic force, and amid the sound of heavenly acclamations, the church shall rise up in the image of our Lord, and with the crown of victory on her head and the sceptre of dominion in her hand, in the name of God shall set up her banners. Then Himalaya shall become Mount Zion, and the Pyrenees Moriah, and the oceans the walking place of him who trod the wave crests of Galilee, and the great heavens become a sounding-board which shall strike back the sound of exultation to the earth till it rebound again to the throne of the Almighty. Angel of the Apocalypse, fly! fly! for who will stand in the way of thy might or resist the sweep of thy wing?

The Jungle Preacher.

How Deva Sundrum Resigned a Government Office in India to Carry the Gospel to the Pariahs of the Jungle.

AN enthusiast of the true type is the impression one forms of the man whose portrait appears on this page. He is a picturesque figure clad in his native scarlet robe, with his tiger skin, the symbol of consecration to jungle labor, hanging from his shoulder. His dark skin and long silky hair, his high forehead, large black eyes, strong regular teeth, and clear cut features, render him a figure, that once seen, is not soon forgotten. He holds the rank of major in the Salvation Army, and has come to this country to consult with Commissioner Booth-Tucker, who spent the greater part of his life in India, and knows the country well. The present famine in India is a crisis in which the wisest heads and the longest experience are needed to devise means of alleviating suffering and averting death. Deva Sundrum knew that he would find both in the devoted man under whose command he labored in India, and with them, that kindly sympathy which India so sorely needs in her hour of trouble. The traveler has been kindly received at Salvation Army headquarters, and will carry back to his native land, for which he sails next month, the heartiest messages of good-will from the Commissioner to his old comrades.

The story Deva Sundrum tells of his conversion and his labors in India under the banner of the Salvation Army is full of fascinating interest. He was born at Ootacamund in 1859. His father was a medical officer in government employ in Madras. As a boy he received an excellent education in Hindoo literature and entered the civil service as engineer and surveyor. In this capacity he was sent to various parts of India and eventually to North Borneo. During one of his visits to his native land, while he was employed in North Borneo, he landed at Singapore and there fell in with dissipated companions and joined in the scenes of wicked revelry which go on in that port. His strong nature entered with zest into the vicious pleasures of the set among whom he was thrown, and when he left Singapore he was an adept in all sensuality. In this condition he reached Colombo in Ceylon, where out of mere curiosity he attended the meetings the Salvation Army was holding there. The young man was deeply impressed, but under the influence of his evil companions and with change of scene he reverted to his evil life. His stay at his father's home was brief and he returned to North Borneo, a hardened, vicious man. At his next furlough, he found to his surprise that the Salvation Army had opened a station at Ranipet, not far from his father's house. Drawn by his recollection of the meetings at Colombo the previous year, he went to Ranipet and there the Holy Spirit brought him to repentance.

Deeply sorrowing over his past wickedness, rejoicing over the assurances of forgiveness through the blood of Christ, the young convert asked, like Paul, what Christ would have him do. He felt that he was called to a career of self-sacrifice, and he began by resigning the position which Hindoos count worthy of long toil and hold in highest esteem—an office under the English government. He wanted to be free that he might preach the Gospel to his own people. Persecution followed. His father was indignant that the son who had been educated at so much trouble and expense, and who had attained so honorable a position, should throw it all away with no other prospect than that of begging his daily rice. Deva Sundrum, however, persevered, and some years later had the satisfaction of seeing his father himself become a Christian. On his death-bed the old man blessed his son and bade him go on in the work to which the Lord had called him.

It was in 1884 that Deva Sundrum was converted and pledged all his future life to Christ's service. For several years he labored among the high-caste people of the cities, preaching Christ and working in the ranks of the Salvation Army. The work was disappointing. Race prejudices, caste prejudices, social prejudices all combined to obstruct the Gospel. The people to whom he preached, even when convinced of the truth of Christianity, had not the courage to make the sacrifices that were involved in a public profession of faith in Christ.

Oppressed by a sense of failure, Deva Sundrum went away for a season of retirement of fasting and prayer. He went to the jungle to be alone with God. There the spirit of self-sacrifice came upon him again with new power. In the jungle were the Pariahs, the very lowest of the outcasts with whom no high-caste Hindoo would associate. They are practically slaves, the lowest of the low, who must not even walk on the high roads lest they pollute the air which the Brahmin breathes. Their very touch is counted pollution and their presence an intolerable insult to the high-castes. To these Deva Sundrum resolved to go. In their misery they were the very people who would rejoice in a Saviour who casts out none who come to him. He turned a deaf ear to his friends who pictured the horrors of the life he was about to take up. He was reminded of the days and nights he must spend in traversing the tiger and elephant-infested jungle, of the wretched homes of the Pariahs, mere mud huts in which alone he could find rest after his weary journeys, and of the dense ignorance and superstition of the people to whom he was going. But none of these things moved him. To the Pariahs he would go and to those who needed the glad news of the Gospel more than any others, he would preach the unsearchable riches of Christ.

From that time until the day he left India to visit his old Commander in America his life has been given to this work, the repulsiveness of which only a Hindoo reared in wealth and luxury can appreciate. He has walked from village to village crossing the intervening jungle in which he has frequently slept on the carpet he carries, while the roars of wild beasts sounded in his ears. In South India he has thus visited 884 villages as a pioneer of the Gospel, has entered over thirty thousand houses and walked 3,513 miles. In North Travancore he has reached 1631 villages, called at 34,796 houses and walked 4,095 miles.

Another Remittance for the Starving People Dispatched by Cable to the Missionaries for Distribution—The Gifts of Readers Anticipated.

MANY urgent appeals have been received during the week in behalf of the suffering people of India. In response to these, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has decided again to anticipate contributions, and has now forwarded by cable the sum of twenty thousand dollars from the Famine Relief Fund, being the second remittance from the Fund since the movement began. This second remittance, like the first $5,000, goes direct to the hands of the missionaries, who are stationed in the famine districts, and are acting as volunteer distributors. Full details of the remittance, together with the names of the distributors and their respective stations, will be published in our next issue, in which a four-page Supplement will be devoted wholly to the work of Indian relief.

Many prayers will go up to the throne of grace from thankful missionaries and from the hungry people whom they are enabled to feed, for a blessing on the compassionate readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who have come to their help in this season of dire extremity. Many a poor creature suffering the pangs of starvation has by this time gone to the mission-station, and has been fed through the kindness of the readers of this journal. It must have cheered the devoted missionaries, whose hearts are wrung by appeals to which they could not respond, to have funds so liberally placed in their hands. We can imagine the joy with which the money would be turned into grain to feed the perishing. But who can tell the joy of the native as he received the gift which meant the difference between life and death for him and his children? Such a gift coming from utter strangers who, hearing of his need, denied themselves to supply it, is an object-lesson he can never forget. It proves to him, as preaching could not prove, that the religion of Christ is a religion of love and pity and helpfulness; for the gift coming from Christian America and reaching him through the channel of the American missionary, is so obviously disinterested that he cannot fail to learn the lesson. We congratulate our readers on having availed themselves of the opportunity to teach such a lesson, and so to recommend to the people the religion of Christ. There is not one who has given up a luxury or a pleasure to send a dollar to keep some sufferer alive, whose self-denial is unnoticed by his Lord. He knows that the self-denial is for his sake, and for love of him, and it pleases him that his people should prove their love to him in that way. To all such, the promise is given in his own words: "Whosoever shall give to drink unto one of these little ones a cup of cold water only, in the name of a disciple, verily I say unto you he shall in no wise lose his reward."

All accounts from the famine districts agree that the need increases in volume daily and that the area is extending. Just as we go to press, Major Deva Sundrum of the Salvation Army, has called at the office of this journal to tell of a letter he has received by the last mail from his wife in Madras. He shed tears as he read and translated the harrowing details she gave of the suffering around her, and pleaded with him to make it known to the Christian people of America. The Viceroy of India reports that there are now 2,750,000 persons employed on the relief works, and this fact affords an unflinching test of the intensity of the suffering. At the corresponding period of the famine of 1877, only 1,229,725 persons had applied for relief, which is less than half the number now employed. When we remember how many died of starvation in that dreadful year, we realize the truth of the statement that this is the worst famine of the century. It is gratifying to know that so many are being supported at the expense of the Government, but the fact is appalling when we regard them as the representatives of the far larger number who through age or distance, or exhaustion from protracted hunger are unable to reach the relief works. We are glad to see that the Christian people of England are contributing liberally to the relief fund opened by the Lord Mayor of London. Already $1,472,380 has been given by firms and private individuals in England for relief. Canada, too, is contributing nobly to the same cause. The fund opened by the Montreal Star has reached $40,000, and that journal daily devotes a large part of its space to lists of contributors who are sending in their gifts. But all these sums fall far short of the need. The starving people are counted by millions and the greater part of them will die for lack of food if there should be any suspension in the flow of private generosity. Fully eighty millions are in the area of famine and scarcity, and a large proportion of these are aged people and children, who being unable to toil on the relief works, are dependent on charity for their support, and must continue so until harvest.

In an appeal recently issued by the London Missionary Society it is stated that in the Telugu district alone, there are eleven thousand native Christians connected with the Society's stations, of whom nearly the whole are in imminent danger of starvation. The American stations are evidently in the same condition, for the Methodist Conferences have formally requested Bishop Thoburn to make an earnest appeal to American Methodists for help, and the American Board, the Presbyterian, Baptist, and Disciples' Boards have received similar appeals. One fact related by Rev. T. S. Johnson, the Methodist missionary at Jubalpur, is a specimen of many others. "The body of a poor man was found this morning he says, 'in the corner of our compound. He had come in during the night and before morning came, his spirit had left his poor emaciated almost naked body. This is no uncommon occurrence, but this was the first to come into the mission compound to die.'"

Mrs. Carrie F. Bruere, Methodist Episcopal Missionary at Poona, writes: "There are hundreds of orphan children homeless, dying in the streets. Here is God's open door for his church, an opportunity to gather in many sheaves for him. Hundreds, yea thousands, of these dear children can be gathered by missionaries, for there is no one to claim them. They can be taught of Jesus, and many will become Christians, the future members of a strong Christian Church. These in turn will bring others to Christ. I have been in India for eleven years, and no such opportunity has come. Shall we not embrace it? Although times are hard and finances are low, yet God will show us how we can help if we are willing."

"A few months ago the Lord laid the burden of these children upon my heart. I saw it to be a God-given opportunity, but felt powerless, as I had no money for their support. The burden became unbearable, and after hesitation and much prayer I felt that the Lord would have me begin the work of taking in children. It seemed to me that he would not give such an opportunity, and so lay it upon my heart, if he did not purpose providing for them; so, realizing that the promises were sufficient, I took twenty, and then another twenty, until now 103 boys and girls have been taken in. They were terrible to look at, but after a few weeks of feeding, they have picked up wonderfully. They are all very bright, being from the better classes. I will undertake to provide for children as fast as I may receive support for them."

Confirming this report is a letter recently received in New York by Miss Fisher, Secretary of the Woman's Union Missionary Society. Her correspondent says: "The famine among the children is very pitiful. It seems worse to see little children suffering than it does to see grown people, but both are bad enough."

"If you were with us," writes Mrs. E. M. Bacon, a missionary at Lalitpur, in the Northwest Province, "as we give the famine people their daily grain, I think you would realize a little what famine is. For many months we were so overrun with starving people coming to the mission bungalow for food, and crying with that heartrending cry of theirs all times of the day and evening, that we decided to have one time and one place only for giving grain. They now gather at 10 A. M., and then we give them grain and teach them Gospel verses.

"We feed those who are really starving, and not those only hungry, or else it would mean feeding all the town. Some of the starving are living skeletons, almost naked, and affected with diseases brought on by starvation. We give to the children first, who sit in separate rows, and all are generally pretty quiet, unless they think the grain will not last out; then they come to us like hungry animals—fighting, crying, pushing, till we can do nothing with them. Oh, you never saw anything so pitiful! The men and women take the grain from the children, and snatch it from each other, having no sense of anything but their hunger. We found two children who have been living for several weeks on scraps of grain picked up by the roadsides. We could not think at first what they were doing. They were scratching on the ground with their bony fingers, like chickens. We took them into our Orphanage and fed them. You never in your lives saw such grateful little creatures. But like other missionaries, our treasury is nearly empty, and when all is gone, unless the kind Christian people at home replenish it, the day will come when we have no grain to give them."

Some of the contributions which have reached THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office have a pathos of their own. The letters accompanying them show that in not a few cases the gifts cost self-denial. Among these letters are the following:

A friend in Christ, Butler, Ind., says:

I send one dollar in Christ's name for the hungry people of India. I am only a working girl, but I can spare a small mite and may God bless it to the relief of some poor, starving creature. I hope others who can do more will give of their abundance that no more people may die for want of food.

Frances Zieman, Pine Ridge:

My little girl feels so sorry for the starving children of India about whom you tell us in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. She has two dollars of very own saved up, and she will have me send of them to you to be sent to feed them, and she prays every night that they may be fed.

Edward Morton, Moline, Ill:

I appreciate your sympathy in this cause in dealing with such promptness, so large a sum for poor sufferers. I pray, God that your example might arouse a like feeling through this and other countries. I feel proud to be associated with a paper in this good cause.

Anonymous, Makayuna, N. Y.:

I send my mite for the starving people of India. I wish it was more, but I am a poor orphan and invalid, but my prayers go with it.

Mrs. K. B. Cook, Portage, Wis., says:

One dollar of the enclosed amount is from a servant girl, who feels she must help in some worthy cause.

Dawson Unser, Morris, O.:

I do not like to read of children starving, my child has plenty, so I send this for our baby.

H. K. Greene, Bruceville, Ind., writes:

This gift is from the Primary department of a public school. It has been the custom here for teachers to treat their pupils on the "last day" candy, oranges and peanuts. I told them of the starving children in India, and they unanimously to sacrifice the treat and send money to buy bread for them and they also brought pennies from home to go with it. It is not only their loving little hearts made a greater sacrifice than we older ones can fully realize. Candy is a common thing in their homes and some of the pennies were all they owned.

Alice Triflet, Villa Ridge, Franklin Mo., writes:

I am a poor girl, but as you say one can keep a sufferer alive, I think I ought to spare that much.

Dr. Ph. D. Paul, Chicago, Ill., writes:

May the $5,000 you have sent to starve India be doubled and redoubled over and over again, and hundreds of thousands of sufferers be relieved through your fund.

Grace Hartman, Lyons, Pa.:

I have been taking care of 100 and other refuse all summer and have sold them for fifty cents. I should like to give it to the starving people in India. I could give more but I am only eleven years old.

Raymond Blackmon, Groveville, Pa.:

I am a little boy eight years old. I want to send fifty cents of my own money to the poor starving people in India. Will you please send it to them for me?

Mrs. C. B. Hazelton, Oconomowoc, Wis.:

I cannot eat or rest without thinking something to those poor starving creatures in India.

F. Wilder, Hartford, Conn.:

I am a poor widow but God has never allowed me to go hungry. I should like to give my mite.

A Cripple, Perth, Kans.:

Please accept the enclosed for India's starving people. It is small, but it is literally every bit I have in the world.

Mrs. L. S. Jenkins, Charleston, W. Va.:
It is so little I can do to relieve such spread suffering as you describe that it seems worth giving, but when I read how dollar would do I felt that I ought to see five dollars I had.

Thomas Williams, Tonesboro, Ind.:
A hard-working man with seven children. The Lord is good to us all.

J. E. Farrand, Boonton, N. J.:

My little girl has been saving her money buy flower seeds, but she wants to do for the seeds, so she may send it to feed the hungry little girls in India.

HEROIC PERSONALITIES

By REV. LOUIS ALBERT BANKS, D.D.

The Father of Prohibition.

ONE evening, many years ago, a woman came to the home of Neal Dow, in Portland, Maine, in great distress. She was the wife of an intelligent, capable citizen, with a large, promising family. He held a government position, and executed the duties of his office to the great satisfaction of the department and of the public; but he had one terrible habit which grieved and mortified his family and friends and threatened the loss of his office: it was periodical intemperance. On his way back and forth from his office to his house, he passed a certain liquor shop and was enticed into it to drink.

On this occasion the wife was in great sorrow and tear. She said her husband had been away from his desk and was now in this liquor shop; that if he did not at once return to his employment, he

ago. Mr. George H. Shirley, at present a citizen of Brooklyn, and one of Mr. Dow's faithful coadjutors in that great campaign, says of him: "Many times have we heard him pour forth the most scathing invectives and the most brilliant utterances against the traffic, and not hesitating to denounce the rum-seller by name. These oratorical efforts were equal to the best speeches of Sumner or Phillips. I have often been surprised that he escaped physical injury from his opponents."

The secret of Dow's great success was his utter fearlessness and his readiness to attack the wrong wherever he found it, and his keen feeling for personal responsibility for every wrong it was in his power to right. The following incident sets forth this chief heroic characteristic of the man.

Neal Dow was once passing down one of the streets of Portland, Maine, when he noticed a crowd of people, among whom would be removed from office, and the family would be left in shame and destitution.

Neal Dow went immediately to the liquor shop and inquired for his neighbor. At first the rum-seller endeavored to conceal his customer, but Mr. Dow found him and requested the proprietor to sell him no more liquor.

He replied: "I must supply my customers."

"But don't you see," said Mr. Dow, "this gentleman has a large family to support? If he needs to go to his office to-morrow he will lose his place. I beg of you do not sell him any more strong drink." The rum-seller then grew angry and said he too had a family to support, that he had a license, and would sell to all who called for it, and that he wanted none of Dow's advice.

Neal Dow's answer was: "So you have a license, and support your family by the income of it, and run of other families? Well, God's help I will try to change all this."

How he did change it! How he sowed Maine knee-deep in temperance literature, how he traveled the whole world round, how he fought the whole world round. It is for this that the present generation of younger people have much conception of the old pioneer, who will be ninety-three years of age on the 20th of March, and capable of a half a century was the mayor of the city. In the centre of the group was a country lad, crying. The lad had been imposed upon by a noted horse jockey of the town, who had got the boy drunk, and then induced him to swap the horse he had driven into town for an old plug.

Upon hearing his story, telling the boy to follow him, and lead the jockey's horse. Mr. Dow led the way to the latter's stable, nearly a mile distant. Not finding the jockey in, the old horse was turned into the stable, and Mr. Dow, with the country lad still following, turned to go down-town again. On the way they met the jockey, driving in a wagon to which the lad's horse was attached.

"That's my horse," said the boy.

Mr. Dow stepped into the road, took the horse by the bridle, and calling to one of his employees who happened to be passing at the time, told him to unharness the horse, which he did, the rate jockey swearing like a trooper, and threatening to take the law on Mr. Dow, who replied:

"You will always know where to find me."

Then telling the boy to take the horse, he started to lead the way down-town where the lad's wagon had been left.

"Look a here," said the jockey, as they went "what am I to do with my wagon?" "Do what you like," said Mr. Dow. "It is nothing to me."

As may be expected, the country lad was full of joy and profuse with thanks.

When he had harnessed his horse, he said to Mr. Dow:

"Now, what can I do for you?"

"Promise me not to drink any more."

And the boy did so.

Some three years afterwards Neal Dow was stopped by a countryman in the streets who, with mouth stretched on a broad grin, said, pointing to a horse, "There he is. I hain't drunk no more."

More Wonderful Records—The Contest to Close June 1.

THERE is no diminution of the popular interest in the contest for the Sunday School attendance Championship. During the week a number of additional entries have been received, many of them with remarkable records. The contest will continue until June 1, after which no names will be received. Teachers and superintendents are requested to send as promptly as possible the names of all scholars who have a record of consecutive attendance of five years.

THE BIBLE

AND THE NEWSPAPER

Crushed by an Avalanche.

ABLE dispatches from Switzerland report the partial destruction by an avalanche of the famous hospice of St. Bernard on the Alps. An enormous mass of snow and ice fell on the left wing of the building completely demolishing it. Provisionally no one was lost, and the occupants were able to tunnel through the snow to the other part of the hospice, which remained intact. Probably there is no edifice in the world so well known as this ancient building. Although the present hospice is only a few hundred years old, a similar structure has stood in the Alpine Pass since the year 962. It was founded by Count Bernard of Menthon, who devoted forty years of his life to rescuing and succoring the numerous travelers who annually crossed the Alps on their way to and from Italy. He planted it near the great pass which runs by Mont Veillon, whose summit towers two thousand feet above the highest point of the pass. The hospice is eight thousand feet above the level of the sea and is close to the line of perpetual snow. It is a large regular mass of stone buildings capable of accommodating six hundred persons. The lowest floor is given up to stables and store-rooms, and above are the drawing-room, refectory, and dormitories. About forty monks of the Augustinian order reside in the hospice and manage its affairs. During the year they entertain as many as twenty thousand travelers who usually stay overnight. No charge is made to the guests, the funds of the hospice being sufficient to cover the expense. Guests have, however, the opportunity of contributing to the treasury, and it is customary to give at least as much as similar entertainment would cost at a hotel. Residence at the hospice is very trying owing to the extreme severity of the cold. Few of the monks are able to stay the fifteen years for which they pledge themselves. They are, for the most part, broken in health, suffering from rheumatism and other ailments resulting from life at so high an altitude, where the water lasts nine months of the year and the thermometer frequently registers twenty-five degrees below zero. The monks, aided by the sagacious St. Bernard dogs, which are bred at the hospice, go out daily to seek travelers who are lost in the snow. The records kept at the hospice show a large number of lives thus saved during the year. It is matter for thankfulness that this work of mercy was not interrupted by the accident which occurred. Had the avalanche taken its course only a few yards farther to the right, the whole hospice would have been demolished and many lives would have been lost. Both the monks and the people who depend on them for shelter in this inhospitable region, have reason to bless God that the destruction which came so near them was escaped:

"Thou shalt not be afraid... for the destruction is wasteth at noonday... Because thou hast said the Lord which is my refuge even the most terrible habitation there shall no evil befall thee, neither shall any plague come nigh thy dwelling." (Ps. 91: 3-10.)

Sinking Town.

Press dispatches from Wilkesbarre, Pa., report a serious disaster at the pretty little mining town of Wyoming five miles from that place. On the evening of March 14 a sudden shock as if from an earthquake. Almost immediately the building began to sink. The adjoining houses were similarly affected. The occupants realizing that a cave-in had occurred in the mine under the town, hastily collected their valuables and hurried away. The king of the houses continued until they were twenty feet below the level, and there were great cracks two feet wide in the streets. The subsidence of the land increased in area, but not to so alarming an extent. The post office seems to have been in the centre of the cavity, but it is feared that the greater part of the town will be more or less affected. In the mine which caused the disaster eleven men were at work at the time of the cave-in. They made a rush for the foot of the shaft, but already there had been a rush of sand and water and before the miners reached the cage they were struggling with water up to their waists. Five minutes later it would have been impossible to get out. The men say that there is a quicksand a hundred feet deep, above the highest rock, and that it is in motion. Ninety-six mules were in the mine, and the men tried to save them but the animals would not leave their stalls, and when the men realized that their own lives were in imminent peril they left the mules to their fate. It was well for them that they did so for they had no time to spare in saving their own lives. It may be hoped that the men who have had so narrow an escape will show similar prompt decision in seeking safety for their souls. Unhappily, in that matter, men are too apt to act as the mules did, and cannot be induced to quit the worldly refuges in which they are easy and comfortable, heedless of the eternal disaster that threatens them. These men, at least, must understand and appreciate the warning of the Psalmist:

"Be ye not as the horse or the mule which have no understanding." (Ps. 32: 9.)

Leaking Gas Explodes.

Eight persons were killed and over fifty injured in Boston, Mass., on March 4th, by an explosion of gas. For nearly three months past, people who lived near the junction of Tremont and Boylston streets have complained of the smell of gas in the streets. Nothing was done, however, and the odor increased. On the morning of the explosion the smell of gas was unbearable. About noon a trolley car passed the place and from under it came the sudden glare which is common with the electric cars. Instantly there was a loud explosion. The car was lifted bodily from the tracks, fell back broken in two pieces, and in a moment both fragments were in flames. Several cars in the neighborhood were shaken and more or less injured. One of them had its roof torn off and all of them had their windows broken. The houses and stores on both sides of the street also suffered. A jeweler's store suffered most, the jewelry and watches in the show-window being scattered on the sidewalk. The police and firemen were promptly on the spot and worked to take out the dead and dying from the shattered car. The injured included men and women and children. They were suffering from broken bones, contusions and cuts from broken glass. Ambulances were summoned and those most seriously hurt were removed to the hospitals. It is believed that the accident was caused by the electric spark from the trolley car igniting the gas which impregnated the roadway. The gas had been a long time permeating the soil, but when that was done a momentary spark was sufficient to cause disaster and death. It is so with the evil of sin. We wonder when some great defalcation or other crime is committed by a man of standing and position, but if we had known his inner life we should have been aware that almost imperceptibly he had been a long time drifting under the bondage of sin, until a sudden temptation found him a ready prey.

Sin when it is finished bringeth forth death. (James 1: 15.)

Saved from Suicide.

There is now living in Nashville, Tenn., says a journal of that city, a man who owes his life to having in his pocket at a crucial moment the portrait of the young lady to whom he was engaged. He is the son of a wealthy banker, but when a young man he committed a flagrant act of disobedience and his father turned him out of his house and forbade him ever entering it again. The young man was overwhelmed with remorse. He went from one friend to another to obtain some help toward a start in life, but he had disgraced himself and no one would help him. Despair took possession of him. He sold his watch and bought a revolver with the money. Going out to a retired place in the woods he sat down at the foot of his own love, but the conviction that this woman loved him that kept him from self-destruction. It is so with the Christian. The power that draws men out of their sins is the love of Christ for them.

Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us and gave his Son to be the propitiation for our sins. (1 John 4: 10.)

Reunited by a Child.

Papers filed in the Court of Chancery of New Jersey last week tell an interesting story of reunion. About a year ago a divorce was granted to a couple whose married life had been unhappy for several months previous. The husband complained of his wife's faults and the wife alleged extreme irritability and cruelty on the part of her husband. When the divorce was granted the custody of the only child of the marriage, a little girl eight years old, was given to the wife. The husband was very fond of his daughter, but of course he had to yield to the decision of the court. Nine months after the divorce the little child was taken sick and her life was despaired of. She wept continually for her father whom she had deeply loved. At last, to satisfy the child, he was sent for. He went and his visit had a soothing effect on his daughter. She begged him to come again, and afterward he visited her daily, meeting his divorced wife. Contrary to expectation, the little one began to mend, and both her parents rejoiced over her recovery. Their old affection for each other revived during the time of anxiety, and when the child was able to sit up she pleaded with both to have them with her. Finally concessions were made on both sides and they joined in an affidavit to the court praying that the divorce be set aside. Their request has been granted, and the reunited family have moved into a new home. It may be hoped that their common love for the child which has brought them together again, may continue, and save them from quarreling. The Church of Christ is held together by such a bond. Christ hoped that love for him would be so potent a force that every one who felt it would regard every other lover of himself as a brother.

By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another. (John 13: 35.)

Treasures in Safety.

The manager of a safe deposit company has been contributing to the press some interesting reminiscences of the customers who, during the past twenty years have confided their treasures to the company's keeping. The company provides a number of small rooms like the cells of a police-station to which customers may retire with the boxes in which their valuables are stored and may examine them at their leisure. They are used chiefly by men who have stored stocks and bonds in the boxes and want to cut off the coupons as they fall due. One customer, however, excited the curiosity of the officers. He would visit the vaults about twice a week, generally in the evening. He would emerge from his cell with his pocket bulging and would return in the morning with it in the same condition. After receiving his box he would stay a few minutes and would then come out without the bulky parcel and would hand his box back to the officer and leave, having evidently transferred the parcel from his pocket to the box. That customer died and when the regular period allowed by the company had expired, the box was opened. It contained a gambler's lay-out which the man had been using and returning twice a week for years. Another case was that of a widow who used to call regularly once a week and would remain in the little room about half-an-hour. Her box was opened after her death and was found to contain a little toy rattle, a tiny baby shoe and a long golden curl tied with a blue ribbon. The poor woman had evidently feared to keep these precious relics at home lest they be destroyed by fire, so she had placed them where she knew they would be safe. What different motives controlled those two depositors! How different an estimate did the company place on the treasures which to them were so precious! Both are now in that realm in which they know what is really worth preserving. Happy are they who in that clearer light find their former estimate confirmed.

I know and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him against that day. (1 Timothy 5: 23.)

REVIEW.

Sunday School Lesson for March 28.
Golden Text, Acts 12: 24. By Mrs.
M. Baxter.

UT the Word of the Lord grew and multiplied" (Acts 12: 24). Such is our text, and such is the key-note of those wondrous, Pentecostal times which we have been studying the last three months. He who, as a corn of wheat had fallen into the ground and died in his crucifixion and burial, was now bringing forth much fruit (John 12: 24). The Word, which was in the beginning, which was with God, and which was God (John 1: 1, 2), had fallen into the soil of our humanity, and out of his death, life was coming to many. "When thou shalt make his soul an offering for sin, he shall see his seed, he shall prolong his days, and the pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in his hands. He shall see of the travail of his soul and shall be satisfied" (Isa. 53: 10, 11). It was which grew and multiplied, not a doctrine drawn from the Word, but the Word itself—himself. The written Word and the living Word are inseparable. Before he came into our flesh, Christ was the Word; (one of his last names in the Book of Revelation is this: "His name is called the Word of God" (Rev. 19: 13). In Heb. 4: 12, 13, it is impossible to distinguish between the written and the living Word of God. The human body of the Lord Jesus might pass through death and be laid in the grave, but no power of death could hinder the sanctifying of the Word of God. Men thought they had silenced Jesus, but there were witnesses of his ascension who were to become one hundred and twenty voices in the place of one, on the day of Pentecost, and thus "the Word grew and multiplied." The visible presence of Jesus was withdrawn, but he ascended that he might receive gifts for men and be sent down by God, the Holy Ghost, who took his place, and on that same day of Pentecost, three thousand more lives and voices became the channels for that same Word of God. Already it was bringing forth much fruit.

And the immediate instrumentality of the conversion of the three thousand was no remarkable eloquence of Peter, the chief spokesman, nor yet of the remainder of the disciples. Peter's sermon consists entirely of Old Testament Scripture applied by the Holy Ghost in Peter through the light of Christ. This is the kind of preaching by which the Word of God grows and is multiplied. It is the Word of God which is as fire and "like a hammer that breaketh the rock in pieces" (Jer. 23: 29), not sermons, which are words of man spoken about a text. The power is in the text, not in the sermon; in what God says, not what man says. The sword of the Spirit is not the commentary, but "the Word of God" (Eph. 6: 17); and the more a preacher preaches Christ's words and not his own, the more they burn and the more they break the rock in pieces.

When the harvest of Christ's incorruptible seed, begotten of the Word of God (1 Pet. 1: 23), began to appear at Pentecost, the world, the flesh and the devil arrayed their powers against the Word of God. The hearing of

through the authority of the name of Christ spoken by Peter, was the signal for the onset of the powers that be, and the war against the living Word in his followers was commenced. The chief priests and elders of the people, the ecclesiastical representatives (not of God and his truth) but of the world and the flesh, were determined to persecute this way unto the death. Nevertheless "the word grew and multiplied." The council of the priests assembled, and put their heads together, and with all their power attempted to assert and to use their authority to silence the witnesses of this Word of God which they began to feel as a mighty power against them. But its false advocates appealed to a higher court which their judges ostensibly respected. "We ought to obey God rather than men." The Word, whose servants we are, is an irresistible force. "We cannot but speak the things we have seen and heard," (Acts 4: 20), and their enemies were nonplussed: the mighty power of God in his Word conquered and the very opposition, made the Word yet more grow and multiply. Meanwhile the terrible judgment of proving undeniably the mighty power of the Word, sent such a thrill of awe throughout Jerusalem that "great fear came upon all the Church and upon as many as heard these things." But far from curtailing the forward movement of the Word of God, "believers were the more added to the Lord, multitudes both of men and women," and the work of healing, which in the case of the lame man at the gate of the temple had aroused the jealousy and enmity of the priests, was immensely increased. The very streets were filled with sick people seeking if only that the shadow of Peter passing by might overshadow them. And not one of them was disappointed, they were healed every one.

Maddened with rage those who now had proved themselves to be the enemies of God, priests though they were, went the length of shutting up in prison those whose lives and words and works condemned them, but the prison could not hold them. The Holy Spirit, who then had full right of way in all the members of the primitive church, needed the voices of these men through which to speak the word, and the prison was opened by divine power, that the ministers of the Word might go on their way of witness. And one of the Sanhedrim itself, the noble Gamaliel, restrained his fellow counsellors from further proceedings against the apostles, lest haply they should be found to fight against God.

Things were coming to a crisis. The enemy, unable to overcome the disciples from without, introduced division among themselves, and "a murmuring arose" among them about the distribution of the widows; and the infant church, which up to this time had been unassailable, while she produced a saint of the first order in Stephen, yet had to see him become a martyr. With division, death came in, not as in the case of Ananias and Sapphira, where the Holy Spirit could not tolerate sin for an hour among the disciples. But she was no longer invincible; the enemy had gained an advantage, and from henceforth there was weakness and corruption in the church itself.

Stephen had borne his powerful testimony, but he must seal it with his blood, and now the volcano which had been rumbling, broke forth into an explosion, and martyr after martyr fell a victim to the persecutors, so that all the disciples, except the apostles, were scattered. But the Word? God be praised, it still grew and multiplied, for they that were scattered abroad "went everywhere preaching the word," and not in vain. The whole city of Samaria had a spirit of hearing, multitudes were saved, the whole city filled with joy, so that the persecution which brought death to some was life from the dead to others. Then too the Lord found means to gain the heart of the prime minister of Candace queen of the Ethiopians, and thus again the Word grew in a new soil, to be after multiplied. May not the small results in our day arise from the lack of the Word itself in the preaching of so many?

But perhaps no soul was more fertile than the soul of that man who was the chief instigator of the death of Stephen, and of the persecution of the Christians. The war between the Word and the world, the Prince of Life and the prince of this world, was raging, and the enemy thought he had secured in Saul of Tarsus the very instrument who could best carry out his plans. As an angel of light he came to the young fanatic, and playing upon his Jewish pride, stirred him up to be a defender of the faith of his forefathers.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

VARIOUS methods may be taken for the review of the eleven lessons of the quarter. The object to be attained is, of course, to impress on the minds of the pupils the teaching of each subject and any method of classification which will do this, may be used. There is the method of dates, taking each event in order as it occurred; or of places, showing what events occurred in Jerusalem, Samaria, the desert around Gaza and Saul's conversion outside Damascus. Or the review may follow the classification of persons, recalling the names of persons mentioned: Peter, John, Stephen, Philip, Saul, Ananias of Jerusalem, Ananias of Damascus, Caiaphas, Gamaliel, the lame man and the Ethiopian convert—eleven in all. It is believed that these eleven lessons covered the events of about ten years. It was a critical and deeply interesting period. Looking around now at the triumphs of Christianity, and seeing how in every land it is being preached, and in all lands there are multitudes to whom it is more precious than anything else in life, we turn to that period of origin and note how gradually the doctrines of Christ unfolded, and men slowly took hold of them and applied them to the problems of their lives. If any one doubts the divine origin of Christianity the study of this period ought to remove such doubts. It is unlike any programme of human construction. Its elements are such as human wisdom would reject as being so certain to lead to failure that the divine wisdom which planned and appointed them is manifest throughout. That Christ should have been removed at a time when his presence seemed indispensable; that a miracle and a sermon should have aroused the people of the very city in which Christ was crucified but a short time before; that one of the most useful and eloquent advocates of the new faith should have been stoned to death, not only depriving the young church of his services, but striking terror into the hearts of converts; that hypocrisy and untruthfulness should have been detected in the very heart of the little church; and that persecution should scatter the little flock, depriving them of mutual comfort and support—all these events seemed untoward and detrimental, yet out of these flowed the great movement which has penetrated to the far corner of the world. Science has developed with prodigious strides, civilization and commerce have expanded; empires have risen and fallen; wars have devastated the earth and systems of philosophy have been promulgated and passed away—the one thing that has survived changes and has grown and increased, at the end of eighteen hundred years, is more life and vigor in it than anywhere else, is that religion which, at the beginning of the period, had no more adherents than could be gathered in one upper room. Gamaliel was a true seer, and his was the only explanation of the phenomenon. "If this counsel or this work be of men, it will come to nought; but if it be of God, ye cannot overthrow it."

Even as many as the Lord our God call (Acts 2: 39). December 31, 1691, a critical day in Scotland. Word had sent through the Highlands that James William could tolerate no longer the rebellion which smouldered among the mountain tribes. They were dealing with enemies and had never renounced allegiance to the Stuart family. The had borne it with the magnanimity characterized that great monarch, but for the sake of the peace of the country, disloyalty must cease. No inquisition was to be made for past offences, but every chief with his retainers must take the oath of allegiance to the king. Any man who had not taken it before the close of the year 1691 would be treated as a rebel. Plenty of time was allowed for the chiefs to reach outlying districts, and sheriffs were appointed at convenient places to administer the oath. Loyal men took the oath at once. Even the disloyal intended to take it, but these latter put it off as long as they could. One chief who was resolved to be the last in Scotland to swear, waited until the very last day. The day passed and he had not come in. A storm impeded travel over the mountains and he did not get till too late. He bitterly deplored his delay so long, but his enemies would not listen to his excuses. He and the chief of his retainers were remorselessly put to death. They had been called repentance, but had postponed it till too late.

Had all things common (Acts 4: 32). Followers of Christ became one family, all shared in the possessions of the members, as brothers in a household shared the food and comforts of the home. An old ballad tells the story of a man who had an insane dread of wanting water and being able to get it. He had huge cisterns constructed and pipes laid to bring water into them. Every spring he could dig in the hills was laid under tribute, and a pipe connected it with the new cistern. All the village suffered a scarcity of water, that his cisterns and pools might be full. He could not use the water, but he did there ready in case the need for it should ever arise. People said he was a miser, but no such charge is ever made against men who accumulate money they cannot use, and impoverish others by trying to add to their store.

There fell from his eyes as it had fallen scales. (Acts 9: 18). He saw no external objects, but how mistaken he had been in despising Christ and persecuting the Christians. In a tailor's shop there was a young man who was the butt of the ridicule of the men. They hated him because he would not spend money to join them in any expense. They derided him "the miser," and taunted him with his meanness. They were not bad fellows, but they hated niggardliness. Although the young man's life was made miserable by them. One day one of the men saw him coming out of a poor tenement and he went in, curious to see what place he lived in. He was directed to his room by a child he met on the street. He went in and there he saw stretched on a couch a beautiful girl, so like the tailor, that it was easy to see she was his sister. She talked freely about her brother. She said that she had a disease and could not move from her couch, but he had suffered her to live for nothing. He spent all his money on nurses and doctors and delicacies, but she had made her life as happy as could be. But it was hard for him. The man went back to the shop and told the story. There was not one there who was not ashamed of his past conduct. The scales had fallen from their eyes and they saw the young man in a new light.

THE FAMILY AND HOME CIRCLE.

Out-Door Life in California.

Our Mexican Border Wards and their Progress—An Open-Air Laundry.

AMONG the loveliest of Uncle Sam's possessions are the "lost provinces" of Mexico, which lie between the sea-coast and the mountain ranges of California. On the border land, and in Arizona, New Mexico, and Texas which adjoin our sister republic, there is now a population of over three hundred thousand Mexicans, speaking their own ancient language and still adhering to the customs and dress of their forefathers. The extension of our public school system and the spread of missionary enterprise have done much toward enlightening and educating this people, and the young generation of Mexican-Americans is fair to become good, intelligent citizens of our Union.

A considerable portion of the Mexicans in California are small landowners and cultivators. They live in a simple way, in adobe or light frame houses. They have a few of the advantages or "improvements" of our modern civilization and are content to cling to comparatively primitive methods in husbandry, as well as in all matters relating to domestic life. Our photograph on this page is a very good illustration of this fact. It is one taken from life, at San Juan Capistrano, in San Diego county, California. The Mexican housewife has an improved laundry in the back yard, where she is doing the household washing, and as she rubs and rinses the clothes, and spins them out to bleach, her lord and master and their little one sit contentedly on the sunny bank, watching the operation. It is a country in which summer practically lasts the year 'round, where snow is not known, and where the soil is so fertile that the cultivator can readily raise several crops each season with very little labor. They receive subsistence to an easy problem, which suits the indolent nature of the Mexican who is not prone to excessive labor, if it can be readily avoided. There may be occasional frost, but it rarely kills the semi-vegetation, and disagreeable days are few and far between. Indeed, there are seldom more than fifteen or twenty rainy days during the entire season. The air is dry and wholesome, the nights cool and refreshing, even in midsummer, and out-door life is possible the year 'round. Travelers have said this delightful section of the Union is the Utopia of our Continent, the ideal climate, whose salubrity and general desirability will come to be more and more recognized as the years pass by.

Women of Fifty.

A fifty woman need not be broken down physically, if she has a kind husband and good children. That is the age when experience and practical wisdom are most needed for the benefit of the world. It is the most favorable period for important literary work. It is also a woman's best time for going into public life, if home cares have set her free. The temperance cause needs women of mature experience and ripened intellect, and the younger women need leaders who are wise and motherly. What is true of the temperance cause is also true of church work, where "others in Israel" can perform holy offices of ministrations to those whose feet are newly turned into paths of righteousness, and also in guiding and encouraging the young. Young men and young girls away from home need the friendship and assistance which a woman of fifty years can best give. Social purity work, in particular, should be under the direction of matronly women. Inexperienced young girls, although capable of a great work among companions of their own age, are less fitted to go into the slums or visit jails. It is a sensible, motherly, sympathetic woman who can safely reach a helping hand to her fallen sister, and who, more than often can reclaim a fallen brother.

The woman of fifty can do much for the rising generation, by giving to young mothers, the benefit of wisdom gleaned, it may be, amid tears and heartaches. It should be the most useful and serviceable period of her life.

A Humble Girl's Fame.

One of the grandest women of whom literary Europe is now talking, was the daughter of a family so poor that her little cradle was rocked by a waterfall, by means of a wheel attached to a rocker, while her mother toiled in the fields.

As the child grew up, she mended her used, she would have never been heard of and the world would have missed a great inspiration.

Child Possibilities.

What mighty possibilities there are in a little child! The story is told of a Hindu father who said to his son: "Bring me a fruit of that tree, and break it open. What is there?" The son said: "Some small seeds." "Break one of them and what do you see?" "Nothing, sire." "My child," said the father: "Where you see nothing there dwells a mighty tree." So in the wee toddler at our knee there may be hidden the germ of a great statesman, warrior, scientist, philosopher, painter or legislator. He may be a Croesus or a Lazarus, a beloved monarch among men or a tyrant. Let us strive and work and pray that he may be a Christian and a benefactor of his race.

Home Politeness.

"How do you expect your children to be well-bred in society, if you do not practice courtesy and politeness at home?" was the inquiry a lady addressed to a somewhat thoughtless mother. And she was right. We should be careful that in family life we do not let familiarity swallow up all courtesy. Many of us have a habit of saying to those with whom we live, such things as we say about strangers, behind their

BE PATIENT.

SWEET friend, when you and I are gone Beyond earth's weary labor,
When small shall be our need of grace From comrade or from neighbor;
Passed all the strife, the toil, the care, And done with all the sighing—
What tender truth shall we have gained, Alas! by simply dying?
Then lips too chary of their praise Will tell our merits over,
And eyes too swift our faults to see Shall no defect discover.
Then hands that would not lift a stone Where stones were thick to cumber
Our steep hill path, will scatter flower; Above our pillowed slumber.
'Tis easy to be gentle when Death's silence shames our clamor,
And easy to discern the best Through memory's mystic glamor;
But wise it were for thee and me, Ere Love is past forgiving,
To take the tender lesson home— Be patient with the living.

Pleasant Sabbath Afternoons.

WHAT shall be done for the very young children on Sabbath afternoons in rural localities, where it is impossible to send them to Sunday School? This question is entertainingly answered by Mrs. Fanny A. Welcher, of Newark, Wayne county, N. Y., in a little booklet which she has just published. She says: "All children love to travel. One Sabbath we have a map of the world which can be cut from any old atlas or bought for a few cents, and pasted on a large card-board. We want to send a telegram to a missionary, for whom we are working, or about whose people we are studying, so we build a telegraph line from New York or Boston to India. We do this by sticking pins along the entire route, then fasten a piece of dark thread to the pin at the starting point, wind it about the next pin and so on till we reach our destination, with our message. Once there, we can learn what is being done to teach other children. We take a paper published in Philadelphia for children, and which is charming. Some one reads a story from this, and as each month's issue is devoted to a special country, much may be learned in that way. We also take a paper printed in colors. Back numbers of many papers can be bought very cheaply, and on each Sabbath a new one is distributed. One friend has the Mission Band meet at her home on Sabbath afternoons. There are forty members with an average attendance of thirty-seven, showing how great is the interest and enthusiasm. Some Sabbaths we have a praise service, and our restless Tom is generally usher or sexton, arranges the seats, rings the bell. We always have plenty of music. Begin when they are very small, let them think of plans. Each one wears a badge, every child is an officer, and the leader is appointed a week ahead. All through the week, pieces are copied from books or papers, to be read, programs are made out with care, each one taking part. Even a little one of five has her "scribbles," and the program is read with as much interest and dignity as if it were plainly written. Children are very fond of formulating plans, and when one little "tot" of seven recently said, as leader, 'now we will all listen to the notices: there will be a picnic on Monday, a tea-party on Tuesday, a trip to the lake on Wednesday, ice-cream for everybody,' etc., etc.—the effect upon the audience can be better imagined than described. A few audible smiles though do not work any harm. One feature of our society is the sentence prayer. This teaches growing children to frame their thoughts. How many children are put to bed by their nurses and only occasionally 'say their prayers!' Sometimes the requests at our meetings are original and peculiar to say the least, but they soon learn to express themselves well." We believe many mothers would find Mrs. Welcher's booklet exceedingly helpful.

Since the days and years are slipping away so fast, and the children go out into the great busy world so soon, let us fill their hearts and minds with that which is "abiding," and try to lead them father's nets in winter, oiled his great boots so that he could stand in the icy water to fish, dug the potatoes, cut the wheat, gathered pine needles to fill the beds, sheared the sheep, and spun until her hands were bleeding. At sixteen she went out to service, and at twenty she married a poor peasant lad who had loved her from childhood. Until very recently she regularly swung the flail on the threshing floor, mowed the hay with a scythe, and bound the sheaves in time of harvests. For twelve years after her marriage, so stern was her poverty, she never saw a newspaper or a book, a Bible or a hymn-book, the things above all else she craved. Uncomplainingly, however, she endured her hard lot, and from the darkness rose—a poet. A special messenger was lately sent by the Empress of Germany to find this unknown writer of verses which had so moved her. The messenger found a woman of forty in a poor village home near the Russian border. She was weak and feeble, but her soul was full of song which all the hardships of a bitter life could not quench. The world wondered at and appreciated the peasant-poet and now Johanna Ambrosius is finding her lot easier and her friends wonderfully multiplied. What a lesson in encouragement her life contains for those who, because they are born amid poor surroundings, feel that "it isn't worth trying" to fill any special state in life or to strive to reach a higher plane. Had Johanna simply accepted her lot and left her talent to lie un-backs. There is no place, however, where real politeness is of more value than where we mostly think it would be superfluous. You may say more truth, or rather speak more plainly, to your associates, but you ought not to do it less courteously than you would speak to strangers. If brothers and sisters are courteous and polite to each other they will certainly be better prepared for the duties of life which require the constant exercise of these qualities.

Barbarous Headgear.

A reader of this paper (Miss Bessie L. J., of Chatham, N. Y.) has this to say on the subject of birds' plumage in women's hats: "I was interested in a note from a correspondent in your columns this week about the wearing of ostrich plumes. She asks if they are plucked in a cruel manner. I have received a pamphlet from the Boston Audubon Society which states that the plumes, when ripe, are cut off, which is painless, and a stump of six inches left. In a few weeks this dries and is removed and the bird is uninjured. So the wearing of ostrich feathers is entirely consistent in a bird-lover. But the aigrettes which are so universally worn are gathered in a brutal manner. They are found only on the mother bird at the breeding season, and at that time the birds' nesting grounds are invaded by hunters who kill them in great numbers, pluck out the feathers from the dead or dying birds, and leave the young to die."

THE KING'S HIGHWAY

A STORY OF THE BROADER CHRIST-LIFE

Steve's Opportunity.

BY

AMELIA E. BARR.

"I ON'T think so," was John's reply to Mr.

Lloyd. "It is an old theory that wages are paid out of capital, and that to increase wages you must increase capital. I don't think in any dispute between masters and men, the question as to whether the capital sunk is sufficient to increase wages is ever raised—the dispute is whether prices will allow of the increase. The men then look to production, not to capital, as the fund out of which wages are to be paid. That, however, is not the question now. I do not see what this strike will accomplish. There is no necessity for it. Work is plentiful and wages are not bad. They will have no public sympathy. It is the wrong time," said John with an air of worry.

"That is just it. When other people have a good market before them, they set themselves to make the best of it. Workingmen, driven by their unions, choose that lucky period for strikes and idleness. But they can't coerce customers as they do employers, and by all that's fair and just! there is a point when even employers will abandon work that does not pay them."

"Is it not right that workingmen should do what they think best for themselves?"

"A conspiracy against free labor is not good for any one, John McAslin. Why do you stand still?"

"To say 'good-night,' sir. I turn eastward here."

"Are you going home?"

"No, I am going to a Socialistic meeting."

"I should like to go with you."

"You may hear some unpleasant truths, sir."

"Still, I would like to go—if you have no objections."

John said he had none, and the two men walked across the city together. "I want to know what your Socialism means, John," said Mr. Lloyd. "Of course, I know, that it looks to an entire change of society."

"If Socialism meant only a change of society without a change of its heart, it would mean no change at all, except on the surface. Socialism means a changed conception of human life, a higher conception of human dignity."

"Is humanity not dignified enough?"

"No. We want a dignity that will scorn to claim what it has not earned, a dignity that will not feel itself degraded by any kind of honest labor. Socialism means the simplifying of life as much as possible. It means the defence of all weak members of the great human family. It means courage to live by our personal convictions. It means charity for the failings of others; in short, it means the application of the Christianity of the first century to the daily life of the nineteenth century."

As well as the noise and confusion of the streets would permit, this argument was continued until they reached their destination. A group of men stood before it, smoking; John said a few words to them in an undertone, and then assisted Mr. Lloyd up the narrow, dimly-lighted stairway. He was quite excited by his adventure and he said to himself—and meant it—this is far better than sitting alone planning and worrying."

The room, a fairly large one, was well filled even to the door. Nothing could be less inviting than its general appearance. The seats were of unpainted wood, and the solitary gas burners protruded at intervals from the bare, plastered walls, and yet the humanity filling it gave to the room appointments a visible and unquestionable dignity and interest. John appeared to be well known and well liked. Men made way cheerfully for him and a youth rose and gave Mr. Lloyd his seat. It was a voluntary mark of respect for a man whose name was known of his wealth or influence.

Then John was aware of some strong feeling agitating the whole assembly—a feeling of anger and dissent—and lifting his eyes to the platform he saw Steve standing aggressively in front of the audience, his hands in his pockets, his head thrown forward a little, his lips tight set, his eyes flashing with that electric spark, that distinguishes the modern eye.

"You have nothing to fear, sir," said John to his companion, for he saw Mr. Lloyd's face pale, and a visible tremor pass down his large body. "I know that speaker. It is his delight to see how far he can stir these men up. He has been defying them now about something or other. I know he has. Look at him!"

It was easy to look at the handsome, disdainful youth, for he seemed to stand alone, and to thoroughly enjoy the storm he had raised. It was the more remarkable because of its silence. Hissing and groans would have been less dismaying to most men, than the still wrath of that voiceless crowd. Evidently he was waiting for the words which no one had the courage or the ability to give him.

"Nothing to say!" he ejaculated. "Of course you have nothing to say. Then I will tell you once more that it is all muddish nonsense, our clamoring about our 'rights.' We don't know how to use the 'rights' we have. Talk about shorter hours! Hadn't we better give up working altogether? Most of us have already found out how little work we can do in our present hours. Who ever sees a good day's work done in these times? We should be far more ashamed of it than of doing real bad work. I'll tell you what! We are a lot of dishonorable idlers who take money for work we do not do."

"It's a lie! A lie as big as the United States!" shouted a man from the audience.

"It's the solid truth," retorted Steve. "Denying truth doesn't make truth a lie. I know it's the truth, for I'm in with you. There is not a bigger idler anywhere than I am. But I like justice, it is a sixth sense with me; I like justice for every man. I don't care whether he is rich or poor. And I say that just as long as we take money for work we do not do, we can hold our tongues about rich men living on interest and dividends. We are birds of the same feather. Sweep the cobwebs out of your brains and give rich and poor alike, fair play."

"Do you mean to say, Steve Morrison, that a poor, badly paid working man, taking his work as easy as he can, is as big a thief as—well, say, old Nicholas Lloyd, gormandizing and drinking, and sleeping, while a lot of poor souls are sweating and worrying, to make his interests and dividends?"

"Six of one and half-a-dozen of the other," answered Steve with a complaisant smile. "I happen to have done something for the rich man you name. He isn't a worse sort than the crowd of us in this room. He does not gormandize, his servants eat far richer food, and twenty times more of it. Suppose he does drink, are all of us strictly temperance? As for poor men sweating and worrying about their work, I don't know any that do it, but I do happen to know that Nicholas Lloyd can't sleep of nights for worrying about his investments. Do any of us want to join the dividend dance of the present day? I should say not! Do we want to welter down to idiocy? Do we want the shadow of paresis following us to a premature grave? You imagine these kings of the stock market build palaces. No they build private asylums. We may as well let the rich man and his troubles alone, he has plenty of them."

"He has that," said Mr. Lloyd, thumping his stick on the floor and drawing on himself the curious gaze of many eyes.

"He does not know what freedom is," continued Steve. "He is the prisoner of society; he is the prisoner of his very servants. He can't whistle or sing on the street or shout across it to a friend, it would not be respectable. He can't put a bundle on a stick and take a long tramp with nature. We can. The rich man has to wear particular clothes at particular times, and in particular ways. Which of us would do that? Their trusteeships seilless" flirting with our national history. John McAslin you know what we want, and if you can't start it I will," and his bright face aglow and smiling and springing to its majestic swing and Steve rolled out the battle hymn of Christian Socialism:

The day of the Lord is at hand, at hand;
Its storms roll up the sky;
The nations sleep starving on heaps of gold
The dreamers all toss and sigh.
The night is darkest before the dawn,
When the pain is sorest, the child is born
And the day of the Lord is at hand!

Gather you, gather you, angels of God,
Freedom, mercy and truth!
Come, for the earth is grown coward and Come down and renew us her youth.
Wisdom, self-sacrifice, daring and love!
Haste to the battle-field, stoop from above
To the day of the Lord at hand!

Steve came down to his friend's side the last line. He was having what he considered a glorious time, and he looked almost triumphantly as the fervent words fell sharply to his footsteps. Lloyd rose as he advanced. He was of excitement, and hesitating as he regarded Steve, between anger and appreciation. Steve broke the last word of song in two when he saw his father, made no effort to escape the immediate interview.

"Steve, you did pretty well," said old gentleman. "I have a great deal to forgive you. Go to the platform, Steve, and I will go with you. I can't forgive these people their faults as well as a can, and it is only fair some rich man an opportunity with them."

"No, sir," answered John, quickly. "I would not do at all. Besides, the members are dispersing. I am sure also you are very much tired."

"I never enjoyed a night as much of my life. It has been the best kind of entertainment. John McAslin, this is my friend Stephen Lloyd."

"We know each other well, a great deal," answered Steve. "John and I are brothers. I am engaged to marry his sister, Jessie."

"Then you are a very lucky fellow."

But John said nothing. A sudden shadow attacked him; he left Mr. Lloyd the care of his son and went thoughtfully home. Steve's reticence regarding his family did not please him. Under the circumstances he thought he ought to have more confidential. He would much rather have had no acquaintanceship between Alice and Steve. He feared this relationship would be an injury to his own. For love quickens the apprehensions, and he had long perceived that Alice had much of her liking for his sister. He therefore understood, without saying on the matter, that she would be apt to think her brother's marriage to Alice was "enough of the McAslins. At this feminine probability so exercised his heart, that the perilous fascination of knowing the worst of it" took possession of his intellect, and he resolved at the first opportunity, to put to Alice the question on which his whole future happiness depended.

CHAPTER VIII.

"I Must Go and See Jessie."

It was Jessie's and Steve's wedding day, and they sat together in the parlour, talking over their last preparations. Their own beautiful home was ready for occupancy, and after the ceremony were going to it. Steve had ordered flowers for its decoration; the table laid for their wedding-dinner; a parlour servant was at that moment coming. There was a rapture of love on the handsome face as he drew his hand toward him, and an adorable shyness answering tenderness on Jessie's.

"We shall meet no more until we are in God's house," said Steve. "I shall see you, darling, as from his very hand. And then he drew her closer to him and kissed her fair face with a fond, solemn affection."

Attairs had gone very well with Steve after those memorable interviews with mother and father. He took to the work provided for him, and gave it a sensitive attention. Nor did he find it tedious. There was a variety of interest, constant movement which afforded scope for his restless disposition. To the recurrence of certain duties a few hours made him often impatient, yet he had never given way to a pulse which longed to defy what his life was positive and periodical.

CHRISTIAN HEROISM.

Heroes as Cross-bearers—The Marshes of the Home and Workshop.

Enough in this day and land, sacrifices, such as the first followers of Christ had to make, and such as still have to be made in non-Christian countries, are not involved in a confession of Christ; but there is still a cross to bear and still a living in the injunctions of our Lord. (Eph. 9: 18-26, 31-62). If the Christian is not to incur the risk of loss of home and property and life by declaring himself a follower of Jesus, he is liable to be called on for services which will test his fidelity. The spirit of the world and its principles are as antagonistic to the precepts and principles of Christ as ever were, and those who would oppose them have need of all the courage and strength that can be had. Duties need to be performed which are irksome and ungenial, but which must not be neglected by one who is a follower of him who pleased not himself. Natural sentiment and natural ambition have been eradicated in following the example of him who, when he was reviled, did not again; who made himself of no reputation and took on him the form of a servant. When companions and friends are pushing to the front, and not caring whom they trample on in their selfish struggle, it requires an effort to follow Christ's injunction to his followers to take the lowest place and be willing to forego all that life has to give in proper and just honors. The hero spirit is not in the Church, nor has the need of it passed away. In many a home and store and workshop the hero is daily toiling on, bearing and forbearing for Christ's sake, without the éclat and appreciation that the hero in the field enjoys. Men and women, unknown to the world, are bearing heavy burdens, and fulfilling their duties day by day, while the spirit faints, and patience is strained, yet supported by Christ's approval.

Neither the world nor the Church needs its heroes. There are certain classes of heroism they are able to recognize. The soldier who goes out to fight, the explorer who opens up new territories, the fireman who saves lives at risk of his own, the missionary who goes to heathen lands to preach the Gospel to hostile peoples—all these are recognized and honored. But there are other men and women who are truly heroic but are looked upon as quite ordinary people. One of the most heroic men we have known was a man whose valiant fight continued through long years, had no kind of recognition. It was a lonely struggle which he waged with a hereditary propensity to strong drink. His father and grandfather and his two uncles had gone down to drunkards' graves. The craving for intoxicants was in his blood and at times was almost frenzied in its demand for gratification. At such times he was alone, and to his associates he seemed morose, but with dogged persistence he held his ground resisting by sheer stoicism the craving of his nature. The heroism of that man's life and the suffering he endured was known to God and to him alone. Another instance of heroism was that of a woman who voluntarily laid her back on a life of love, of ease and luxury, and congenial occupations, that she might minister to an unhappy father and his querulous, repining wife. In a brother who was bent on vicious courses. Patiently and cheerfully she bore the miserable, sordid details of a life of poverty, sacrificing her own life that her family might be better and happier. There are heroes in the business world. Men who harassed and worried and anxious will not sacrifice principle even to themselves out of their troubles, who will not lie or conceal the truth to gain money that would save them from bankruptcy. Heroes there are in the pulpit who will denounce the sins of men on whose good will their bread depends. All known to fame, these heroes struggle against temptation and calmly doing their duty, and will hear at the last the praise that will ever reach their ears: "Well done, good and faithful servant. Enter thou unto the joy of thy Lord."

LAND OF THE UNSETTING SUN.

O HOW precious the promise of God
That, when earth's gloomy shadows are done,
We shall carol with joy in the light of his face
In the land of the unsetting sun.
O how often I dream of the day
When the conquest at last shall be won;
And my soul shall rejoice in the presence of
In the land of the unsetting sun. [God
Sweetest joys that we have here below.
Are but gladness celestial begun;
Are the faintest of beams from the glory of
In the land of the unsetting sun. [God
I can bear all the sorrows of earth
Since I know, when my course shall be run,
That the tears shall be wiped from my wonder-
In the land of the unsetting sun. [ing eyes
O, my Father, I care not how soon
The whole web of my life shall be spun.
I am eager to bask in thy heavenly glow.
In the land of the unsetting sun.
Ref.—O, a gladness supernal shall reign,
And my weary-one toil shall be done.
When I enter the gates of the city of light
In the land of the unsetting sun.

STILLNESS OF HEART.

WHAT the heart is at the birth,
What the soul is to the earth,
What the gem is to the mine,
What the grape is to the vine,
What the bloom is to the tree,
That is Jesus Christ to me.
What the string is to the lute,
What the breath is to the flute,
What the spring is to the watch,
What the nerve is to the touch,
What the breeze is to the sea,
That is Jesus Christ to me.
What the estate is to the heir,
What the autumn to the year,
What the seed is to the farm,
What the sunbeams to the corn,
What the flower is to the bee,
That is Jesus Christ to me.
What culture is unto the waste,
What honey is unto the taste,
What fragrance is unto the smell,
What springs of water to a well,
What beauty is in all I see,
All this and more is Christ to me.

CONVERGING DATES.

A Remarkable Prophetic Period in the Sway of Islam and Rome.

By ARTHUR W. DAY.

THE Eastern Question assumed its present shape at the epoch of the Crimean War. Before then, Europe had come to no definite decision in the matter of Turkey's future, and allowed the process of decay and dismemberment to go on almost unchecked. A time came, however, when fears entertained by England and France of Russian aggrandisement out of Turkey's ruin led to the Crimean War, and after that war the treaty of Paris (1856) laid it down that, in the interests of European peace, the Sultan's Government must be maintained, a friendly supervision being exercised by the joint Powers. Thus the Crimean War marks a new departure in the history of the Eastern Question.

Ten years after the Treaty of Paris 6,000 Christians were massacred in the Lebanon, and ten years later came the Bulgarian atrocities, for which Turkey, refusing amendment, was punished by the loss of half her European territories. And now have come those deeds of darkness in Armenia which have made the Ottoman Empire a hell upon earth.

In short, the plan embodied in the Treaty of Paris, which was supposed at the time to be a final settlement, has proved a failure. "The authors of the treaty," to quote Lord Salisbury, "had attempted what in the nature of the case it was impossible to achieve. They thought that Turkey would reform herself, and long experience has proved that Turkey will not reform herself."

Why is it reasonable to suppose that we should find the Bible throwing some light upon the Eastern question? Because Constantinople is the chief seat of Islam, and Islam is a politico-ecclesiastical system which has been the greatest avowed foe of the Christian faith, and has been "the jailer of Palestine," and the down-treader of Bible-lands.

The apocalypse speaks of a persecuting power which would arise and continue for forty-two months, and as long ago as the Crusades this was understood of Islam. When the Reformation came, the Christians of the West realized that there was another persecuting power nearer home. It struck them that the Papacy had arisen in the West and Islam in the East at about the same time, and they expected that as each was to continue for the same period they would come to an end at about the same time.

So far as the Papacy is concerned, their interpretation has been justified by history, for Papal Rome did lose the last vestiges of her temporal—i. e., persecuting—power almost at the time expected.

But we have here to do with Islam, which arose after the Papacy, and accordingly has retained persecuting power longer. Now as our chief authorities on Islam tell us, the systematic oppression of Eastern Christians began in 637, the date of the infamous Edict of Omar, 1,260 years from that date would bring us to 1897, so we may look this year for some decisive event which, if not in itself the end of Turkey's persecuting power, will immediately lead to it.

The Lord said that "Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled" (Luke 21: 24). Jerusalem had already been trodden down by three of Daniel's four world powers, when these words were spoken—Babylon, Persia, and Greece—and was even then being trodden down by the fourth—Rome.

Rome lost her power over Palestine and Jerusalem through the Mohammedan conquests under Omar, in A. D. 636-637, and if we measure from the time when the Jews first became tributary to Babylon in B. C. 625 up to A. D. 636 we find that 1,260 years, or three and a half "times" was the duration of the ascendancy of Daniel's four world-powers in Palestine.

To them succeeded Islam, and this year (1897) the dominion of Islam will have continued 1,200 years more—i. e., the same period as that which measured the ascendancy of Babylon, Persia, Greece, and Rome over Palestine.

Home Talks with Mothers and Daughters.

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

CROCUS AND JONQUIL.

I KNOW you love flowers. And I am sure that after the long reign of the winter, you are glad that nature again begins to show her never-waning energy—that once more the green leaves unfold, the brave birds return, and wood and garden have signs of coming bloom.

The early spring flowers are the forerunners of a great throng of a procession which will march like an army with banners through the months which lie between this time and another wintry season.

We rejoice to meet old favorites lifting the same faces we have always loved. Mrs. Whitney sings about this:

God does not send us strange flowers every year.
When the spring winds blow through the pleasant places,
The same dear things lift up the same sweet faces,
The violet is here.

And long, long ago, in an idyl which never loses its charm, King Solomon broke out in a rapturous burst of melody:

"Rise up my love, my fair one, and come away. For lo, the winter is past, the rain is over and gone; the flowers appear on the earth, the time of the singing of birds is come, and the voice of the turtle is heard in our land. The fig tree putteth forth her green figs, and the vines with the tender grape give a good smell."

I have always loved flowers dearly, but I can never make them grow. My houseplants wither and my garden, if it depended on my care, would not be the delight it always is, because I see that it is cared for by somebody who possesses the magic which I lack. The secret of successful gardening goes deeper than mere love for flowers: it means time to attend to them, vigilant looking for and constant warfare against the many foes who prowl about and injure plant-life; it implies much individual thought for and care of every flower, from the day of the first green shoot, to the day of the gathered seed. A woman whose flowers reward her by bloom and growth, must do much more than merely love them, more than wear them on her breast, and keep them about her for the displaying of their colors, and the decoration of her house.

Now, dear mother-friend, perhaps you see what this sermonette of mine is about: not about flowers only, but about our beloved children, who are the joy of our heart-life, the pride of our homes, and the fairest plants in our gardens. Day by day these darlings are growing up, with such culture as we can give them, taking impressions of their surroundings, learning from us, as much by our example as by our precept, to be the sort of men and women we would like to present to the Master, with our reverent exclamation: "Lo! here they are, the children whom God has given us!"

Having said this, you will not accuse me of inconsistency, if I begin by the remark that for many children, as for some flowers, nothing is better than a little wholesome neglect. My small neighbor, Genevieve, came in to her mother one day with a puzzled frown on her smooth forehead, and tears in her eyes.

"What is the matter, dearie?"
"Oh! mamma, my flowers don't grow a single bit. I have done everything, watered them, and put in sticks with labels, and dug up the ground constantly to see if they had started, and I believe they are all dead."

Genevieve's flowers were tended to death. They needed to be let alone. I know a young mother who is simply an embodied conscience in her way of bringing up her children. Discipline is never relaxed. Every lapse of good manners, every act of thoughtlessness is observed and punished. Obedience is her fetish, to which she sacrifices her own peace and the comfort of all her friends. An hour in her household when the children are present is, to a child lover, a form of penance as irritating as a haircloth shirt, as distressing as a scourge. It is "Molly, this!" and "Carrie, that!" and "Jack, the other!" till it drives a visitor fairly wild. And the queer thing is that the children are no credit to their mother. They are not obedient, nor are they truthful. They are priggish and time-serving, and it is a grave question how they will turn out in the end. But if their mother could let them alone awhile, they would probably behave as ordinary good children in ordinary Christian households do.

A little wholesome neglect does not mean entire surrender of the home rule into the hands of the children. Little people must be taught to obey because obedience is in the Divine ordering of the universe. They must learn self-sacrifice and devotion to others' comfort, and care for one another, because Christ teaches these virtues, and the law of love underlies all right living. The father must not be so much absorbed in business that he forgets to educate his boys in manliness and patriotism, nor the mother so wrapped up in housekeeping, sewing, social pleasure, or charitable work that her children are left to grow up, like Topsy, as best they can.

Mrs. Jellyby, with her dissipated husband and her unfortunate family, was a by-word years ago, when everybody read Charles Dickens, and his phrases and his people were freely used in conversation, as current coin. She was a satire on the philanthropic lady of the day, but satire as she was, her like has existed, and may still be discerned. I pity the Jellyby children.

The Trans-Siberian Railroad.

It is now some five and a-half years ago since work was begun on the Siberian railway, and it will take four years more to complete its 4,700 miles of track. Seventy thousand men are working on it, and French loans are available for its continuation. Some time ago it was announced that the road was open to the Obi River, 900 miles east of the Ural Mountains; during the present winter connections with the Yenisei River will be made. The work proceeds by sections. If Port Arthur be selected as the principal or sole terminus, and Vladivostok be abandoned, the distance will be greatly shortened and also the time for the completion of the road. It is not believed, however, that the Siberian port will be given up as a terminus. A portion of the track is already laid in the Amoor, and villages are springing up along its line. Russia needs to develop the Vladivostok region, and ways have been devised to overcome the difficulty of ice formation in that port during the winter.

The Wealth of the Sea.

There is no mine, diamond, gold, or silver, on earth that contains half the riches of the ocean. Professor Livensidge, the Professor of Chemistry in Sydney University, in a very remarkable and exhaustive series of experiments, found evidences of gold being present in sea water off the New South Wales coast, in the proportion of about one-half to one grain per ton, or in round numbers from 130 to 260 tons of gold per cubic mile. This, of course, means an enormous amount for the whole of the ocean, the cubic contents of which are put down approximately at 400,000,000 cubic miles; and if the gold be uniformly present, at the rate of one grain per ton, the total amount would be over 100,000,000,000 tons of gold! All the mines of earth do not equal it.

Ms. H. W. Beecher Dead.

On the anniversary of the death of her famous husband, (March 8.) Mrs. Henry Ward Beecher passed peacefully away at Stamford, Conn. She was born in 1812, in West Sutton, Mass., and was a Miss Eunice White Bullard, the daughter of a prominent physician. In 1830, she first met young Beecher who was then a student at Amherst College and who spent a vacation at the Bullard homestead. Seven years later the two were united in marriage and began housekeeping at Lawrenceburg, Ind. They afterward moved to Indianapolis where Harriet Beecher Stowe, while in their home, received her first inspiration for her famous book, "Uncle

THE LATE MRS. HENRY WARD BEECHER.

Tom Cabin." Here their family grew up and here Mr. Beecher's genius in platform and in pulpit first began to assert itself. His devoted wife was a most efficient aid in all his labors and was one of the most important factors in his advancement in the ministry and in literature as well. Her whole career was that of a faithful, loving wife who sank her own personality and made all her talents and energies subsidiary to her husband's interest. She was possessed of considerable literary ability and in this direction undoubtedly was a valuable aid to the preacher, who had pressing demands on his voice and pen from every side. At his death, she spent her time largely in retirement amid her own relatives and busied herself much in literary work. In December last, while on a visit to relatives, Mrs. Beecher fell and fractured her thigh. From this blow to her vitality she never fully recovered. Later her strength sank rapidly and when it was apparent that death was near, her family gathered around her and were with her to the end.

The Street Cries of Cairo.

Much has been said and written of the street cries of European and American cities, but while they are all interesting, the street cries of Cairo have a peculiarly picturesque flavor which we find in the street cries of the cities of the Orient. The Muskee of Cairo, its great native street, is a singular, oriental-looking place, always crowded with strange people, calling somewhat in this fashion:

- Seller of sugar and water—Refresh thy heart! Quench the heat!
- Seller of raisin-water—It is well clarified. Reason! By the life of thy father, it is well and good.
- Preacher—O all nourisher! O all good! O all minister! O omniscient pretzels!
- Preacher—I am the guest of God and of the prophet. I have not yet breakfasted.
- Preacher (in reply)—God open to thee the heart of men!
- Seller of wheat-cakes—These belong to thee, O strong man! How they did knead thee in the night, O cakes!

You know a man by the company he keeps. If he is taking Hood's Sarsaparilla regularly you can rest assured that his blood is pure, his appetite keen and his health the best. Try it yourself.

Rose-seller—The rose was a thorn; she bloomed from the sweat of the prophet!

And thus the cries continue, hour after hour, and day after day.

COVETOUSNESS.

The picture that the Pilgrim saw in the Evangelist's house seems of late years to have been taken down, or Christians who have visited the house have overlooked it. The picture we refer to was that of the man with the rake whose attention was so concentrated on the straws and rubbish that he was scraping together that he could not spare a thought or a look for the angel who offered him a crown. Paul sets the contrast vividly before the young disciple whose ministry was his special concern (1. Timothy 6:6-19). The acquisition of money seemed to the great Apostle a very poor achievement compared with the object for which he would have the young preacher strive. To us in this money-loving age, money seems the one thing to be desired above all others; yet we do not dispute Paul's statement that as we brought nothing into the world we can carry nothing out. He would have his disciple aim at being rather than having. Eternal life is in his eyes something much better worth striving after than great riches. In theory we all agree with him; we should agree with him in practice, too, if there were not in our hearts an unacknowledged inhumanity which doubts whether there is any world beside this. Doubtless few would admit such doubts; but why then do we not concentrate our thoughts on the things of eternity? If we really believe that beyond the grave there stretches out an illimitable vista of existence, is it not short-sighted policy to plan and work and strive for possessions which we must leave at death? We go into that existence with empty hands, but we need not go poverty-stricken. What we have of character and of principle and disposition we take with us and surely common prudence dictates that these shall be of the best. It is low ground to take but on the lowest level we stand self-condemned if our lives are given to money-making.

BRIEF NOTES.

Next week THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will publish a four-page Supplement devoted exclusively to the famine relief work in India, and containing the names of contributors to the Fund which we have not hitherto been able to print in full without encroaching too much on the space of the various departments.

Rev. W. A. Foster, of St. Louis, Mo., has been invited to the pastorate of the West London Church, of which Henry Varley was formerly pastor.

The Third International Convention of the Epworth League will be held in Toronto July 15-18. The first was held at Cleveland, Ohio, in 1893, and the second at Chattanooga, Tenn., in 1895.

Mr. Moody's work in Boston is being supplemented by addresses given every Monday noon at Tremont Temple by Rev. Dr. Alex. McKenzie, of Cambridge.

A deep revival interest is reported from Connecticut. Dr. Edward Judson has been holding special services at Hartford, in the First Baptist Church, and services are being held in many other towns by other Evangelistic preachers.

The pastor of a New Jersey church announces in his church calendar that his sermons are written out on a type-writer, and he will be pleased to lend the manuscript at any time to anyone desiring to read it.

In spite of the troubles in Armenia the circulation of the Bible in the Turkish empire was larger last year than in any previous year. Rev. M. Bowen, the agent of the American Bible Society in Constantinople, reports unprecedented sales.

The Greek Church is following the example of American churches in the propagation of its doctrines in sparsely settled districts. It is placing church cars on the railroad in Siberia. One-third of the area of each car is railed off for the priests.

Arrangements are being made for a series of meetings for the deepening of spiritual life in the churches of New York City. The first meetings will be held in the North Baptist Church, West Eleventh street, early next week. Dr. A. C. Dixon will preside.

Dr. A. C. Dixon, of Hanson Place Baptist Church, Brooklyn, invited the famous London preacher, Rev. Archibald G. Brown to preach in his church on March 7, and in Cooper Union, New York, on March 8. Mr. Brown had a crowded audience on both occasions.

The railway traffic associations have granted a uniform rate of fifty-one dollars for the round trip from Chicago to San Francisco, for the Christian Endeavor Convention July 7-12. Doubtless the half fare rate will prevail between points east of Chicago. Tickets will be good until August 15.

Rev. John H. Elliott assistant pastor of the Central Church, Rochester, N. Y., has been holding evangelistic services at Batavia, N. Y. The pastor of the Presbyterian Church, Rev. Henry R. Fancher, writes that the result of the meetings has been very gratifying. The benefit will be felt for years.

Major Deva Sundrum whose portrait appears on another page, will be glad to give lectures on India for churches or societies. He wears his native costume and describes his journeys through the jungle. Letters may be addressed to him at Salvation Army Headquarters, 125 West Fourteenth street, New York.

During the past twelve months nearly 1,000 new Christian Endeavor societies have been registered in Great Britain, making a total of 3,029. There are 161,784 active members, 44,333 associates, and 13,791 honorary members, making a total of 159,808. Of the 954 new societies, 162 are juniors, 7,278 associate members have become active, and 7,052 have become church members.

Indignation meetings have been held in Minneapolis, Minn., recently, in connection with the liquor traffic. The practice of having the side doors of saloons open nearly all day on Sunday is contrary to law, and the increase of drunkenness is very marked. At one meeting a resolution was passed memorializing the mayor and asking him to reply in writing whether he was prepared to enforce the law of Sunday closing.

The Baptist Home Missionary Society is sending out Gospel wagons through California to districts inaccessible by rail. Each wagon is loaded with Bibles and religious literature, and meetings are held where the wagon makes a stay. There are, it is said, thousands of miles of good wagon roads in the State, adapted to this kind of work.

Evangelist Leonard Weaver and Mr. W. S. Woodin have been conducting meetings at Spokane Falls, Washington. They were held in the First M. E. Church and the Opera House, both of which were crowded at each service. Evangelist Weaver is now holding services at Bridgeton, N. J. His present address is now 440 Market street, Philadelphia.

A Christian Workers' Convention was held at Los Angeles, Cal., recently, in the Simpson Memorial. It occupied five days, with three sessions each day. Among the speakers were Henry Varley, Dr. A. I. Frost, Dr. George Cochran, Rev. H. C. Woodin, Rev. Herbert W. Lathrop, and Mr. S. H. Holley. During the convention thirty-six persons were added to the foreign missionary field.

Dr. I. T. Clark, President of the Christian Endeavor Society writes that as he was crossing the Red Sea, on his way to India, he found no less than ten Christian Endeavorers aboard the ship, and on the South American steamer a delightful Christian Endeavor or prayer meeting was held. From all the missionaries and workers of Christian Endeavor was shown by the fact that one of them had been from England, two from Canada, two from Australia, and the others from the United States.

Mr. D. L. Moody announced a special conference for his staff, to be held at the Hotel Lighthouse, Chicago, April 6-8. He will make the first of a series of addresses at the Institute without being accompanied by those pupils who, on the Sundays following, Rev. W. A. Foster will be there, and on the following Sunday, Prof. D. L. Moody will be holding a conference. The Conference is really for ministers and laymen, but other workers will be welcomed. Expenses as to accommodation, etc., may be addressed to Rev. R. A. Torrey, Superintendent Bible Institute, Chicago.

HIS VOICE.

To hear the Master's voice;

Amid a thousand pleadings,

To make his way our choice—

This, this is life's solution,

And faith will triumph still,

When hearts in sweet submission

Seek but the Father's will.

The hours are full of voices

Which call our souls aside,

And those alone are strengthen'd

Who in God's love abide:

Who spurn with bold denouncement

The tempter's subtle guile,

And seek through love's enchantment,

His service all the while.

Such shall, with life ennobled,

Win, though the strife be long,

And stand by grace perfected

With the great ransomed throng,

Whose joy through endless ages

Shall rise and never cease,

As they follow still as Leader—

The Saviour, Prince of Peace.

Are you a smart seller? We give $100 away in prizes to those able to make the largest list of words from the word RESPONSIBLE. You can make at least twenty, we believe, and if you can you will get a present any way, and if your list is the largest you will get $100 in cash. Here are the rules to follow: Use only words in the English language. Do not use any letters in a word more times than it appears in RESPONSIBLE. Words spelled alike can be used only once. Use any dictionary, and we allow to be counted proper nouns, pronouns, prepositions, suffixes, any legitimate word. This is the way: Responsible, response, rip, sop, sea, sin, sip, soil, sob, sole, etc. Use these words. The publisher of THE AMERICAN WOMAN will give away, on April 10, the sum of $100, divided into 21 prizes for the largest lists of words as above. Add to the person making the largest list $10 for the second largest; $5 each for the next five largest lists; $3 each for the next three largest, and $1 for each of the next 13 largest lists. We want you to know our paper, and it is for this reason we offer these premiums. We make no extra charge for the privilege of entering this word-building contest, but it is necessary to send us 25 cents silver or stamps, for which we will send you our handsome illustrated 25 page magazine for six months, and the very day we receive your remittance we will mail you free a beautiful picture, entitled "The Forest Sanctuary." It is 21 inches a charming present. This offer is the greatest you have ever had made to you. Send your list at once. If you win one of the prizes your name will be published in our May issue. A Ringing Endorsement from Rev. Geo. C. Needham, the Anglo-American Evangelist.

EAST NORTHFIELD, Mass., Feb. 1st, 1897.

MR. J. E. DU BOIS—MY DEAR SIR:—I have invariably declined giving endorsement to medicines or agencies for curative purposes. But after a faithful use of the Electropoise in my family I have had such signal proof of its remedial value that I herein voluntarily testify to its healing virtues. It is my immediate duty to make known its curative properties for the sake of those who suffer. The Electropoise has very materially benefited myself in dissipating the agonies of chronic nervous dyspepsia. I regret that an unjust prejudice founded on misrepresentation kept me from its beneficent help until recently.

MR. J. E. DU BOIS—DEAR SIR:—I fully endorse my husband's testimony to the value of the Electropoise, both in family and personal use.

Yours, ELIZABETH A. NEEDHAM.

REV. GEO. C. NEEDHAM is the Anglo-American Evangelist and Author of Books for Bible study. Mrs. Needham is also widely known as a Bible teacher and theological writer of international reputation.

Church Organs at Greatly Reduced Prices.
Few mercantile moves are of as much interest to our readers as the announcement that the great music house of Lyon & Healy, Chicago, has determined to sacrifice its entire stock of church organs, both new and second-hand. Churches everywhere need new organs, but at the usual prices cannot afford them. So Lyon & Healy, rather than shut down this branch of their manufactory, have determined to make prices on organs, while their present stock lasts, that no church can resist. If you belong to a church that needs an organ—either large or small, costing anywhere between $125 and $1,200, ask yourself if you cannot better afford 50 cents now than a dollar a year hence. For the reductions that Lyon & Healy offer are bona fide, and in some organs amount to nearly or quite half. Time payments may be arranged and every organ bears this great firm's guarantee. Write for the list and further particulars to Lyon & Healy, 100 Wabash Ave., Chicago. They will answer without delay.

SPOTSWOOD, N. J., May 12th, 1896.

Messrs. McKesson & Robbins:

Dear Sirs—Mr. called on me a few days ago and left with me a sample bottle of Tartaric acid tablets, which I gave to an obstinate case of chronic rheumatism. As soon as they were used the patient sent to my office, asking for more of the same medicine, stating that it had acted splendidly. The same patient has taken every preparation and combination conceivable, but this was his last, and this his request and statement. I would like a couple of bottles of tablets for this patient and another in similar trouble.

Yours very truly,

Armenian Aid.

APPREHENSION is felt among the friends of Armenia lest there should be an attempted renewal of the massacres during the coming spring. In the present disturbed conditions of the Turkish empire, this is considered by no means improbable. It is believed, however, that Europe would not permit any high-handed proceedings by Turkey, and Russia in particular would very likely make such an event a pretext for a military occupation of Anatolia. The trouble between Greece and the Porte may at any time burst out into a flame of war that would make ancient Armenia once more the scene of unheard-of atrocities.

Relief work is still progressing at the centres of suffering and especially among the orphan children. In a letter from the Rev. H. N. Barnum of Harpoot, the writer says:

The massacres removed thousands of fathers. The forlorn condition of this multitude of widows and orphans has deeply impressed us. The first distinct effort made for orphans separately, was in Malatia in August, by Mrs. J. Rendel Harris, who, during a visit to that city with Dr. Gates and Miss Bush, gave the money for the support of forty for a year. Our method whenever there is a reliable Protestant community and a school, to have the children placed in families where they will be under good influences and go to school. We take none who have mothers or any other natural protectors. Mrs. Harris has made provision for ten more orphans in Malatia and twenty-five in Egin. Almost every child whom we have taken comes clad in worthless rags. Each is sent to the bath, is furnished with new clothes and a bed. It is not easy to recognize them when they appear in their change of garment. Quite a number of the children whom we have taken have recently been rescued from the Turks and Kurds, and there are still others whom we hope to secure. It is touching to see the anxiety of these little creatures lest they may not be accepted, when they are brought here and their cases are under investigation.

A NEW TRIUMPH. Consumption Can be Cured In Any Climate.

Convincing Free Offer of an Eminent
New York City Chemist and Scientist.

(A scene in the Slocum Laboratories. The Doctor illustrating the merits of his new System Medicine for lung troubles and consumption to medical men and students.)

Nothing could be fairer, more philanthropic or carry more joy to the afflicted than the generous offer of the honored and distinguished chemist, T. A. Slocum, of New York City.

The fact has been established that he has discovered a reliable and absolute cure for consumption, and all bronchial throat, lung and chest diseases, catarrhal affections, general decline and weakness, loss of flesh and all conditions of wasting away; and to make its great merits known, he will send THREE FREE BOTTLES (all different) of his newly discovered remedies to any afflicted reader of The Christian Herald.

Already his "new scientific system of medicine" has permanently cured thousands of apparently hopeless cases by its timely use, and it seems a necessary and humane duty, therefore, to bring such facts to the attention of all invalids who may be benefited thereby.

He considers it not only his professional, but his religious duty—a duty which he owes to suffering humanity—to donate his infallible cure to all afflicted.

It is a common assertion that the age of miracles is past, and yet chemistry and science are daily astonishing a world with new wonders. It is no longer safe to say that anything is not to be achieved. The researches and experiments of this great chemist, patiently carried on for years, have culminated in results as beneficial to mankind as can be claimed for any modern genius or philosopher.

The doctor has proved the dread consumption to be a curable disease beyond a doubt, in any climate, and so on file in his American and European laboratories thousands of "heartfelt testimonials of gratitude" from those benefited and cured in all parts of the world.

Catarrhal and pulmonary troubles lead to consumption, and consumption, interrupted, means speedy and certain death. No one threatened with this dangerous disease should hesitate a moment to write T. A. Slocum, M. C., Pine street, New York, giving explicit and postoffice address, and the medicine will be promptly sent. Every sufferer should take advantage of this most liberal proposition. Please let the Doctor that you saw his offer in The Christian Herald when writing.

St. Vitus Vanquished.

What Cured Little Stanley Nichol of Chorea.

From the Republican-Journal, Ogdensburg, N. Y.

A letter was lately received at the office of the Republican-Journal from Hammond to the effect that the cure of an extraordinary severe case of St. Vitus' dance had been effected on the person of little Stanley Nichol, the eight-year-old son of Mrs. Charles Nichol of that village.

A reporter was accordingly dispatched in that direction who, after some inquiry, found Mrs. Nichol's residence about a mile outside the village. Mrs. Nichol said:

"A little over a year ago my boy, Stanley Nichol, who is now only eight years old, alarmed me one day by being taken with a strange gurgling in his throat. After the first attacks became quite frequent. Stanley did not complain of any pain, but said that he could not help making the noise. At that time there was a New York doctor stopping in the village who was a specialist on throat and nasal diseases. I took my son to him and after a careful examination he said that there was nothing the matter with the boy's throat. The gurgling in his opinion was caused by a nervous contraction of the muscles of the throat. He asked who our family physician was and said that he would consult with him before he prescribed.

"Stanley rapidly grew worse. He was always a sickly boy. One day I noticed that he was jerking his arm up in a very peculiar manner. A few days later he seemed to lose control of his legs, first one and then the other would be pulled up and then straightened out again. He was a perfect bundle of nerves and was rapidly losing all control of himself. When eating at the table or drinking, his arm would often twitch so as to spill what he was drinking. One day he scared me terribly by throwing back his head and rolling his eyes up so that only the white parts showed. I took him to our family physician who prepared some medicine for him. He took it and commenced to improve. The dose, however, had to be increased and Stanley rebelled against taking it. It was a very disagreeable medicine and I don't blame the boy for not wishing to take it.

"Our physician went to New York city on business and while he was away the medicine became exhausted and we could get no more. Stanley was still very bad. About that time I read about a little girl who had been cured of St. Vitus' dance by taking Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. I thought I would try them and procured a box. I followed the directions that came with pills, and gave only half a pill at a dose. I did not see much improvement and increased the dose to a whole pill. The effect was noticed in a day. Stanley immediately commenced to get better and did not object to taking the pills as he had the other medicine. He took seven boxes of the pills and to-day appears to be perfectly well. He discontinued taking them some time ago. He weighs nearly fifteen pounds more than he did and is strong and hearty. A year ago we took him out of school but he is so much better now that he is going to begin again this fall."

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People contain, in a condensed form, all the elements necessary to give new life and richness to the blood and restore shattered nerves. They are also a specific for troubles peculiar to females, such as suppressions, irregularities and all forms of weakness. They build up the blood, and restore the glow of health to pale and sallow cheeks. In men they effect a radical cure in all cases arising from mental worry, over-work or excesses of whatever nature. Pink Pills are sold in boxes (never in loose bulk) at 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50, and may be had of all druggists, or direct by mail from Dr. Williams' Medicine Company, Schenectady, N. Y.

HAIR ON THE FACE, NECK, ARMS OR ANY PART OF THE PERSON QUICKLY DISSOLVED AND REMOVED WITH THE NEW SOLUTION

MODENE

AND THE GROWTH FOREVER DESTROYED WITHOUT THE SLIGHTEST IRRITATION OR DISCOLORATION OF THE MOST DELICATE SKIN.

Discovered by Accident.—In Combing, an inconspicuous mixture was accidentally spilled on the back of the head, and on washing after a day it was discovered that the hair was completely removed. We purchased the new discovery and named it MODENE. It is perfectly pure, free from all injurious substances, and so simple any one can use it. It acts mildly but surely, and you will be surprised and delighted with the results. Apply for a few minutes and the hair disappears as if by magic. It has no resemblance whatever to any other preparation ever used for a like purpose, and no scientific discovery ever attained such wonderful results. IT CAN NOT FAIL. If the growth be light, one application will remove it permanently; the heavy growths are destroyed, although all hair will be removed as each application, and without slightest injury or unpleasant feeling when applied or ever afterward. MODENE PREPARED BY ELECTROLYSIS.

Recommended by all who have tested its merits.—Used by people of refinement. Gentlemen who do not appreciate nature's gift of a beard, will find a priceless boon in Modene which does away with shaving. It dissolves and destroys the life principle of the hair, thereby rendering its future growth an utter impossibility, and is guaranteed to be as harmless as water to the skin. Young persons who find an embarrassing growth of hair coming, should use Modene to destroy its growth. Modene sent by mail in safety mailing cases, postage paid, (securely sealed from observation) on receipt of price, $1.00 per bottle. Send money by letter, with your full address written plainly. Correspondence—sacredly private. Postage stamps received the same as cash. (ALWAYS MENTION YOUR COUNTY AND THIS PAPER.) Cut this advertisement.

FOR STARVING INDIA.

How the $30,000 Sent by The Christian Herald Relief Fund are Being Distributed—Our Readers Energetically Pushing Forward the Great Work of Charity and Life-Saving.

THE remittance of twenty thousand dollars by cable to the missionaries in India announced in this journal last week, was an urgent necessity, in view of the piteous appeals for help which came from parts of the famine district. Five thousand dollars have also been cabled to Veroy's Famine Relief Committee, making with the five thousand previously sent to the ten missionaries, whose names were given in our issue of February 17th, a total of thirty thousand dollars, given in the name of Christ to the starving of India. The contributions of our readers have not reached this amount, but deduction of a single cent for expenses. So much was due to the contributors of the Fund, many of whom have denied themselves luxuries and even ordinary comforts, that they might obey our Lord's injunction to feed the hungry in his name. It has been a pleasure to co-operate with them in this Christ-like work and to serve them in forwarding their gifts.

In the selection of missionaries who would gladly act without cost as distributors of the fund, care has been taken to choose those who are stationed in the districts suffering most severely from the famine, and especially those who have the largest number of native Christians depending upon them for relief. It was important that these should be supplied, because their converts were liable to be excluded by their assurance of the missionaries that men, women and children were dying daily who might be saved if money were supplied to buy them food, made every day's delay fatal. The proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, knowing these facts, felt justified, therefore, in anticipating the gifts of the readers, and advanced the sum required to make the large remittance now being distributed in the form of grain to the starving people. He also defrays the costs connected with the Fund, including extra clerks, printing postage, etc., which will aggregate several thousands of dollars. The various Mission Boards have borne the fees for cabling the money to the field, so that no expenses of distribution have fallen upon the Fund, and every dollar sent by our readers has thus been spent in food and, in food only, without the profession of Christ from any distribution controlled by Hindoos or Mohammedans, who might not be careful to save the lives of relatives and friends who had exasperated them by abjuring the faith of their fathers. The converts would naturally look to the missionaries for help in their dire extremity, and expect from them a practical exhibition of Christian charity. But the income of a missionary is too small to meet so extensive a demand, and much as he might wish to help the starving, his power is terribly limited. The readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, consequently, have done a double service by feeding the hungry and at the same time enabling the missionaries to prove to their people the helpfulness, kindness and love of the religion of

Questions and Answers.

Miss Eliza Peters, St. Paul, Minn. Do you send receipts for charitable contributions sent to your paper?

We do, in all cases where the amount is five dollars or over, or when publication of acknowledgments may be delayed, owing to the very large number of contributions received, as is the case now in the India Relief Fund.

Andrew B. P. Trenton, N. J. Your letter informing me of the receipt of my contribution for the relief of the famine-stricken people of India has just been received. I don't want to be hypercritical, but I say I would have preferred that the postage and expenses should not have been deducted out of my contribution.

All the work, clerical or otherwise, postage, cablegramming, and every other expense of whatever character, including the publication of supplements necessary for acknowledgments of contributions received, is borne by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and every cent of money entrusted to it for any charitable purpose whatsoever, is devoted without the deduction of the slightest fraction, to the purpose for which it was given.

Reader. Will you give me your opinion of having what they call a church "Hard Times Society," where they dress in masks? Is it right? It was more like a dance than anything else in my opinion.

Such entertainments are a parody on religion. They belong to the category of "church amusements" which every truly spiritual church and every earnest congregation will strive to avoid.

W. H. Berlin, Ont., Can. Is it right for a man to accept an office in the Church, if his wife be not in favor of his doing so?

It would be perfectly right for him to do so if he is qualified and has his heart in the Lord's work, even though all his kindred should object. It ought to be a pleasure for a wife to have her husband honored by such a call. At the same time persistent opposition from that quarter might greatly embarrass him in the performance of his duties.

M. M. M. Could you please tell me the meaning of the name Sabrah, and where the name is found, or where it is from? Sabrah is sometimes called Sadie for short.

Sabrah was the beautiful daughter of Protemy, king of Egypt, whom tradition declares to have been rescued by St. George from the fangs of a giant, and ultimately married to her deliverer. She is represented as pure in mind, saintly in character, a perfect citizen, daughter and wife.

L. C. G., Provincetown, Mass. Could you inform me whether the great pulpit orators can sing? Are there any hopes of being an orator if you cannot turn a tune?

Oratory and music are totally distinct and independent of each other. We very seldom find them both highly developed in the same person, and there is probably not one in one hundred of the great pulpit or platform orators who could "carry a tune," except in the most ordinary manner if at all. One may be a magnificent orator without being able to sing a note and vice versa.

D. Misk G. Was Martha a truly converted Christian prior to the time that Jesus raised her brother from the dead?

Yes, we have no reason to doubt that she was a firm believer and disciple of Jesus. Furthermore this is attested by her language on meeting Christ after Lazarus had been buried. (See John 11: 27.) Her nature was, however, probably less purified than that of her sister.

J. W. G., Brooklyn, N. Y. I am a young convert, and I have been a Christian for a few years. I feel like going back to those from whom I stole, and I would like to know if I should make any special effort to make up for my sin, or if I should just leave God and my fellow men.

Expectations, confessions, and full restoration will doubtless go very far toward helping you, and you would follow the plan outlined. But those sins will not take away the sting of the sin that can only be removed by the consciousness of the Divine forgiveness which is ready to be granted if we ask it in the right spirit.

Subscriber, Brooklyn, Wis. I am a farmer and dairyman. Is it right for me to sell my milk on Sunday, and hire a man to draw it to the factory? Is it consistent with a Christian profession?

The commandment is clear and explicit, and only such labor as can be properly classed as of "necessity or mercy," is justifiable. Any other is inconsistent with a Christian profession.

S. C. C., Manchester, N. H., writes: I don't understand how a person can be a true Christian, and see so much suffering among God's speechless creation and not raise a voice against it. Did God make anything to be abused? You say you don't suppose anyone would skin an animal alive; but it is done, nevertheless, and beautiful birds caught and wings cut off, and then they are thrown down to die, just to satisfy our selfish wants. As long as Christians will see this barbar-

Interested One, Albany, N. Y., and Others. I have read with deep interest, the series of articles on Mormonism, published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, from the able pen of Gen. Eaton. Will they be published in some permanent form, say in pamphlet shape, so as to be convenient for reference, instead of compelling one to go over several issues of the paper?

Gen. Eaton is now contemplating the publication of these articles in pamphlet form, and if you will address him at The Concord, Washington, D. C., he will doubtless be glad to give the required information.

Thos. F. Tiffin, O. Was it ever known whose child the Saviour took up in his arms and blessed when he said, "Suffer the little ones," etc?

There is a tradition to the effect that the child so blessed and honored afterwards became Ignatius, bishop of Antioch, and died a martyr's death among the lions in Trajan's amphitheatre at Rome.

C. Scheel, Zetienople, Pa. We have all read of the disgraceful actions (or behavior) of the so-called Christian powers across the sea, toward the down-trodden Armenian and Cretan Christians and feel like calling aloud: Shame! It would have required only the raising of the finger of those powers to stop the massacres of those Christians, but instead of saving them, they have now with concerted action even prevented the Grecian government from bringing deliverance to the Cretan Christians. Where is the archbishop of Canterbury—the head of the Church of England? Has he no tongue to speak out against such traitorous action by his government? Where is the Czar of Russia—the Patriarch of the Greek Church? As for the Emperor of Germany who pretends to be the "Oberbischof" of the Protestant Church I will ask no questions. Verily the words of St. Paul apply to these would-be Christian potentates: "Many walk . . . whose end is destruction, whose God is their belly and

G. Ramaker & Son, Greenleaf, Minn. interest you to know that this amount, $6.50 (as well as $14 sent one week since) was raised as follows: We took the India famine page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of Feb. 17th and made a charity box and placed them on our counter, with a list for names, which we headed. The result so far in two weeks being $20.50.

The idea is a capital one, and we commend it to the attention of others who contemplate helping famine-stricken people in India.

ZUNI INDIAN CEREMONIAL, AT THE FUEBLO OF ZUNI, NEW MEXICO.

The Pueblo Indians, about 12,000 in number occupy nineteen villages. They are chiefly herdsmen and agriculturists. The Zunis speak a distinct language and their customs and traditions prove them to be of very ancient stock. They have many peculiar ceremonial, one being that, after the death of a certain chief or leading member of the tribe, a number of the tribesmen set out for "the home of our others," (the spirit-land), returning after four days with several turtles to which divine honors are paid. These turtles are afterwards killed and their flesh and bones deposited in the river, that they may "return once more to their comrades on the dark waters of the lake of the dead."

Constant Reader. In early life my husband had spells of melancholy, in which he contemplated suicide. The melancholy has returned, and he sometimes wishes he were dead. I have had fears that he might commit suicide, but had no fears for my own life until about a month since, I found spiders in the coffee pot. Ought I live with him at the risk of my life?

You should have a medical examination made, as soon as possible, to ascertain whether he is not in a condition mentally that calls for expert treatment. It may save you much anguish afterward, if you do this promptly.

I H. N., Orange. About three years ago I kept company with a young man. I would not marry him because he would not be a Christian. Since we parted, another wants me to marry him. He shows in many ways that he thinks a great deal of me. Would it be right for me to accept number two, when I still love number one best? I have told number two all about number one, but he does not seem to mind it. He is a Christian. What shall I do?

Yours is certainly a peculiarly trying position. While to give up the one you love, for conscience sake, might seem a heavy sacrifice now, it would probably be abundantly repaid by the affection of an honorable Christian man whom you already evidently esteem. On the other hand, to marry one who rejects Christianity might be to invite a life of misery whose glory turns to shame," (as the German translation has it.)

It originated with Esop, who likened the ancient authors to bees full of "sweetness and light" and the moderns to spiders.

E. B. STEVENSON, A. S. S. U. MISSIONARY.

"My Jim!"

Story of an Untaught Western Boy, who Became a Missionary.

NE of the brightest and most successful workers of the American Sunday School Union is Mr. E. B. Stevenson, who for the past seventeen years has represented the Union in the Northwest the first seven years as missionary in Nebraska and Iowa, and the past ten years the assistant superintendent to the G. Ensign of Chicago, for the western district, which comprises the states of Illinois, Iowa, Wisconsin, Michigan, Minnesota, North and South Dakota, Nebraska, and Montana. Stevenson is now in the East where he is speaking to the larger churches in New York and New England, in the interest of this great work for the neglected children of the rural districts of the country. His methods of presenting the work have been most intensely interesting to the large numbers who have listened to him. Through his efforts the Board of Managers of the Union at a recent meeting decided to take up a new department to their work, viz.: the using of college students during their summer vacations in reaching the neglected children. One of the objects to be attained by this great good it will do the students is to come in contact with the people by the personal efforts. The work of these men will be four-fold: First, systematic house-to-house visitation. Talk-country where one cannot find a single religious book for sale and yet all sorts of trashy literature may be found in every hamlet. In co-operation with Mr. Moody and his Colportage Association the best of books will be secured for these students at the very lowest rate possible, and yet with a profit to the men. Third, in the evening they will hold Gospel meetings, and try and lead those they have personally visited during the day to publicly confess Christ and fourth, where needed, they will plant new Sunday Schools.

The thing above all that led Mr. Stevenson to see the need of this line of work will be seen by what our college student did, as illustrated by the following incident related by himself:

A friend called my attention to a certain township that had over eight hundred people and not a church or Sunday School in it. I asked if there were any Christians. He said, "Yes, there is one man down there that makes enough profession for the whole township." I immediately drove to the community, called upon this man, and asked him if they had a Sunday School. He replied, "No, but if there is a place on earth that needs one, it is right here. Talk about heathen! See that house over there? One of the worst men you ever met lives there." By this time I saw a boy coming on horseback. I said, "Who is that boy?" "He is the meanest boy in all this country. Talk about heathen! They haven't even got a Bible in Jim's house." By this time the boy came up. I reached out my hand and said, "Hello, Jim, come up here. I want to shake hands with you." The boy came up, and I gave him a hand shake, told him I was going to have a meeting down at the schoolhouse, and asked him if he knew where I could get a boy to go around and tell the people of it. He said, "Will I do?" "You will do if you will go." "All right, sir. I'll go." I told him I would give him a nice Bible if he would agree to go around and not miss a single house. We had hardly had our bargain made before the boy turned to the old man standing by, and said, "Don't know but I might as well commence now as at any time. Going to be meetin' down to the schoolhouse next Sunday morning at ten o'clock; come down and bring the old woman and all the kids." I went away perfectly satisfied there would be a crowd.

Sunday morning I drove to the schoolhouse a little early, but to my surprise when I drove up I found the house crowded full and a number of boys standing around the door. I said, "Boys, I would like to get in." One of the boys spoke up and said, "So'd we. It's chuck full clear up." "Well, there can't anything go on until I get in there." "Don't make no difference, you can't get in here." So I was obliged to go around and crawl in through the window. As I reached the desk, I looked down and there sat my Jim on the front seat. He looked up and said, "I fetched 'em!" "I see you did," said I, and gave him his Bible. At the close of my address we organized a Sunday School, and elected as superintendent a gentleman I brought along with me. We then went to a but began to yell with all his might, 'Goin' to be meetin' down to the schoolhouse next Sunday mornin' at ten o'clock; funiest feller you ever see from Cedar Rapids is goin' to be thar, and if you don't come out you'll miss the biggest thing that ever come to this part of the country.' Of course there was a crowd. This school ran along during the summer. In the fall I went back and held some meetings for about a week. There were a dozen hopeful conversions, among them this boy. We secured a minister to come once a month. Finally, we held meetings, and over forty professed Christ. They organized a church and built a building.

Five years later I was addressing the students at one of the largest colleges of the West. At the close a young man came up, reached out his hand, called me by name, and asked if I had forgotten him. I said, "I do not remember meeting you." "Why," he said, "have you forgotten Jim already?" I said, "Why Jim, is this you?" What are you doing here?" He said, "You remember that winter when you held meetings down to our schoolhouse?" I said, "Yes, I remember it well." "Well, I gave my heart to Christ at that time, and have come up here to try to make something of myself." "Well," I said, "Jim, what are you going to do?" He said, unhesitatingly, "I don't know; but whatever God wants me to do, that I am going to do. Ever since you organized that Sunday School down there, I have thought that I would like to do just that kind of work." The next summer, during his summer vacation, we sent him out as one of our volunteer Sunday School missionaries. About the first of August we received a letter stating that he had organized eight Sunday Schools already. He commenced at once some meetings in groves, calling two or three of his schools together in convention, and continued the meetings from night to night. At the close of his summer work we found that over two hundred had professed conversion. The next summer he went out again, and again the third summer. The last two summers he had the service of a tent in which to hold his special meetings. During these three summers he organized thirty-three Sabbath Schools, gathering into them over eleven hundred boys and girls. Eight churches have already developed from these schools, and six of them have buildings of their own; 1,025 professed faith in Christ in special meetings that he held.

Jim is no longer a laborer in the earthly field, having gone to his reward above, but his influence and example remain to stimulate others.

There are hundreds of bright young boys who, if they had a helping hand extended to them, might be as effective servants of the Master as Jim. What a glorious record for a poor, untaught, country lad! If any reader of this journal wishes to know more of this work or to aid it in any way, they may do so by addressing Mr. Stevenson, Cedar Rapids, Ia.

Mr. Stevenson has been speaking to the students of a number of the larger colleges of the East, and has everywhere had a most hearty response on the part of the young men.

East London's Evangelist.

Rev. Archibald G. Brown the Spurgeon of East London now Holding Revival Services in Colorado.

REV. ARCHIBALD G. BROWN.

AMONG the eminent preachers who have addressed the meetings in Cooper Union, New York, since Mr. Moody's departure, has been the Rev. Archibald G. Brown, who in London is known as "the Spurgeon of the East End." Mr. Brown spent a few days in New York on his way to Denver, Col., where by invitation of several churches he goes to hold a month's evangelistic services. Mr. Brown is well qualified by a remarkable experience for such work as this. He is fifty-three years of age, and has been thirty years in ministerial work in one of the most difficult and unpromising districts of the British metropolis. As a lad he was notorious for his headstrong ways and his impatience of any kind of control. He ran away from his boarding school and "kicked over the traces" in every position in which his God-fearing parents placed him.

One day, in 1861, he being then seventeen years of age, young Brown went by invitation to a drawing-room meeting at which the late Sir Stephenson Blackwood was to speak. He listened with some impatience to the earnest speaker's appeals, and at the close was just leaving, when the famous evangelist put his hand on his shoulder and asked if he were a Christian. Brown replied bluntly that he was not a Christian, nor did he desire to be. Sir Stephenson looked at him earnestly with those tender, penetrating eyes and said: "How sad!" Only those two words, but the Holy Spirit carried them to the lad's heart. There was no reproach, no warning, no appeal, only the sorrow of a friend grieved at the spectacle of one bent on going to ruin. Mr. Brown says the words "hooked themselves into his soul" and he could not get rid of their disturbing effect until he had given himself to Christ.

The young man was eager to enter on some kind of Christian work. He went to the superintendent of the Sunday School connected with the church which his parents attended, and asked for a class. The superintendent knew something of him as a wild young man, and he said: "No, Archie, we cannot let you teach." Brown was disappointed. "If I can collect a class will you give a corner of the room to teach in?" he asked. That could not well be refused. The next Sunday the young man came with a procession of denizens of the slums, and Brown's class soon became one of the most conspicuous in the school. Later, he applied to Mr. Spurgeon for admission to the Pastor's College. Mr. Spurgeon was reluctant. He did not expect any good of him, but was eventually persuaded. So well did the young man study, and so earnest was he in his work, that when the deacons of Stepney Green Tabernacle went to Mr. Spurgeon to get his advice about a new pastor, he unhesitatingly recommended Mr. Brown.

His pastorate commenced in 1867. The church at the start was small, but it was situated in a district in which there was unlimited opportunity for work among the poor and the sick. For thirty years Mr. Brown has labored in that district and has received into church fellowship six thousand souls. Greatly to the sorrow of his church, Mr. Brown has felt it his duty to resign the pastorate. A series of domestic bereavements and heavy trials have so depressed him as to render rest and change of scene imperative. It is probable that he will continue his journey around the world and will, we hope, regain the vigor and elasticity of his youth.

"ALL RIGHT, SIR; I'LL GO," SAID JIM PROMPTLY.

house near by, where we had been invited for dinner. We had just seated ourselves when the lady began to laugh. I asked what was the matter. She said she was thinking about Jim. I said, "What about him?" "Well," she says, "you know he came around here, rode up in the front yard, never looked to see whether anybody was around or not,

SUFFERING FOR OTHERS.

A Sermon by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., Without shedding of blood is no remission. on the Text: Heb. 9: 22: . . .

JOHN G. WHITTIER, the last of the great school of American poets that made the last quarter of a century brilliant, asked me in the White Mountains, one morning after prayers, in which I had given out Cowper's famous hymn about "The Fountain Filled with Blood," "Do you really believe there is a literal application of the blood of Christ to the soul?" My negative reply then is my negative reply now. The Bible statement agrees with all physicians, and all physiologists, and all scientists, in saying that the blood is the life, and in the Christian religion it means simply that Christ's life was given for our life. Hence all this talk of men who say the Bible story of blood is disgusting, and that they don't want what they call a "slaughter-house religion," only shows their incapacity or unwillingness to look through the figure of speech toward the thing signified. The blood that, on the darkest Friday the world ever saw, oozed, or trickled, or poured from the brow, and the side, and the hands, and the feet of the illustrious sufferer, back of Jerusalem, in a few hours coagulated and dried up, and forever disappeared; and if man had depended on the application of the literal blood of Christ, there would not have been a soul saved for the last eighteen centuries.

In order to understand this red word of my text, we only have to exercise as much common sense in religion as we do in everything else. Pang for pang, hunger for hunger, fatigue for fatigue, tear for tear, blood for blood, life for life, we see every day illustrated. The act of substitution is no novelty, although I hear men talk as though the idea of Christ's suffering substituted for our suffering were something abnormal, something distressingly odd, something wildly eccentric, a solitary episode in the world's history; when I could take you out into this city, and before sundown point you to five hundred cases of substitution and voluntary suffering of one in behalf of another.

At two o'clock to-morrow afternoon go among the places of business or toil. It will be no difficult thing for you to find men who, by their looks, show you that they are overworked. They are prematurely old. They are hastening rapidly toward their decease. They have gone through crises in business that shattered their nervous system and pulled on the brain. They have a shortness of breath and a pain in the back of the head, and at night an insomnia that alarms them. Why are they drudging at business early and late? For fun? No; it would be difficult to extract any amusement out of that exhaustion. Because they are avaricious? In many cases too. Because their own personal expenses are lavish? No; a few hundred dollars would meet all their wants. The simple fact is, the man is enduring all that fatigue and exasperation, and wear and tear, to keep his home prosperous. There is an invisible line reaching from that store front that bank, from that shop front that counting-house, to a quiet scene a few blocks away, a few miles away, and there is the secret of that business endurance. He is simply the champion of a homestead, for which he wins bread, and wardrobe, and education, and prosperity, and in such battle ten thousand men fall. Of ten business men whom I bury, nine die of overwork for others. Some sudden disease finds them with no power of resistance, and they are gone. Life for life. Blood for blood. Substitution!

At one o'clock to-morrow morning, the hour when slumber is most uninterrupted and most profound, walk amid the dwelling-houses of the city. Here and there you will find a dim light, because it is the household custom to keep a subdued light burning; but most of the houses from base to top are as dark as though uninhabited. A merciful God has sent forth the archangel of sleep, and he puts his wings over the city. But yonder is a clear light burning, and outside on the window casement is a glass or pitcher containing food for a sick child; the food is set in the fresh air. This is the sixth night that mother has sat up with that sufferer. She has to the last point obeyed the physician's prescription, not giving a drop too much or too little, or a moment too soon or too late. She is very anxious, for she has buried three children with the same disease, and she prays and weeps, each prayer and sob ending with a kiss of the pale cheek. By dint of kindness she gets the little one through the ordeal. After it is all over, the mother is taken down. Brain or nervous fever sets in, and one day she leaves the convalescent child with a mother's blessing, and goes up to join the three in the kingdom of heaven. Life for life. Substitution! The fact is that there are an uncounted number of mothers who, after they have navigated a large family of children through all the diseases of infancy, and got them fairly started up the flowering slope of boyhood and girlhood, have only strength enough left to die. They fade away. Some call it consumption; some call it nervous prostration; some call it intermittent or malarial indisposition; but I call it martyrdom of the domestic circle. Life for life. Blood for blood. Substitution!

Or perhaps the mother lingers long enough to see a son get on the wrong road, and his former kindness becomes rough reply when she expresses anxiety about him. But she goes right on, looking carefully after his apparel, remembering his every birthday with some memento, and when he is brought home worn out with dissipation, nurses him till he gets well and starts him again, and hopes, and expects, and prays, and counsels, and suffers, until her strength gives out and she fails. She is going, and attendants, bending over her pillow, ask her if she has any message to leave, and she makes great effort to say something, but out of three or four minutes of indistinct utterance they can catch but three words: "My poor boy!" The simple fact is she died for him. Life for life. Substitution!

About thirty-six years ago there went forth from our northern and southern homes hundreds of thousands of men to do battle for their country. All the poetry of war soon vanished, and left them nothing but the terrible prose. They waded knee-deep in mud. They slept in snow-banks. They marched till their cut feet tracked the earth. They were swindled out of their honest rations, and lived on meat not fit for a dog. They had jaws all fractured, and eyes extinguished, and limbs shot away. Thousands of them cried for water as they lay dying on the field the night after the battle, and got it not. They were homesick, and received no message from their loved ones. They died in barns, in bushes, in ditches, the buzzards of the summer heat the only attendants on their obsequies. No one but the infinite God who knows everything, knows the ten thousandth part of the length, and breadth, and depth, and height of the anguish of the Northern and Southern battlefields. Why did these fathers leave their children and go to the front, and why did these young men, postponing the marriage-day, start out into the probabilities of never coming back? For the country they died. Life for life. Blood for blood. Substitution!

But we need not go so far. What is that monument in Greenwood? It is to the doctors who fell in the Southern epidemics. Why go? Were there not enough sick to be attended in these Northern latitudes? Oh, yes; but the doctor puts a few medical books in his valise, and some phials of medicine, and leaves his patients here in the hands of other physicians, and takes the rail-train. Before he gets to the infected regions he passes crowded rail-trains, regular and extra, taking the flying and affrighted populations. He arrives in a city over which a great horror is brooding. He goes from couch to couch, feeling of the pulse and studying symptoms, and prescribing day after day, night after night, until a fellow-physician says, "Doctor, you had better go home and rest; you look miserable." But he cannot rest while so many are suffering. On and on, until some morning finds him in a delirium, in which he talks of home, and then rises and says he must go and look after those patients. He is told to lie down; but he fights his attendants until he falls back, and is weaker and weaker, and dies for people with whom he had no kinship, and far away from his own family, and is hastily put away in a stranger's tomb, and only the fifth part of a newspaper line tells us of his sacrifice—his name just mentioned among five. Yet he has touched the furthest height of sublimity in that three weeks of humanitarian service. He goes straight as an arrow to the bosom of him who said: "I was sick and ye visited me." Life for life. Blood for blood. Substitution!

In the legal profession I see the same principle of self-sacrifice. In 1846, William Freeman, a pauperized and idiotic negro, was at Auburn, N. Y., on trial for murder. He had slain the entire Van Nest family. The foaming wrath of the community could be kept off him only by armed constables. Who would volunteer to be his counsel? No attorney wanted to sacrifice his popularity by such an ungrateful task. All were silent save one, a young lawyer with feeble voice, that could hardly be heard outside the bar, pale and thin and awkward. It was William H. Seward, who saw that the prisoner was idiotic and irresponsible, and ought to be put in an asylum rather than put to death, the heroic counsel uttering these beautiful words:

"I speak now in the hearing of a people who have prejudged prisoner and condemned me for pleading in his behalf. He is a convict, a pauper, a negro, without intellect, sense, or emotion. My child with an affectionate smile disarms my care-worn face of its frown whenever I cross my threshold. The beggar in the street obliges me to give because he says, 'God bless you!' as I pass. My dog caresses me with fondness if I will but smile on him. My horse recognizes me when I fill his manger. What reward, what gratitude, what sympathy and affection can I expect here? There the prisoner sits. Look at him. Look at the assemblage around you. Listen to their suppressed censures and their excited fears, and tell me where among my neighbors or my low men, where, even in his heart, I expect to find a sentiment, a thought, to say of reward or of acknowledgment, or even of recognition? Gentlemen, you may think of this evidence what you please, bring in what verdict you care. I asseverate before heaven and you, at to the best of my knowledge and belief the prisoner at the bar does not at this moment know why it is that my statement falls on you instead of his own."

The gallows got its victim, but the mortem examination of the poor criminal showed to all the surgeons and to a world that the public was wrong. William H. Seward was right, and hard, stony step of obloquy in the courtroom was the first step of the of fame up which he went to the top within one step of the top, that landed him through the treachery of American politics. Nothing sublimer was seen in an American courtroom. William H. Seward, without standing between the fury of the people and the loathsome imbecile. Substitution!

In the realm of the fine arts there is as remarkable an instance. A brilliant hypercriticized painter, Joseph W. Turner, was met by a volley of from all the art galleries of Europe, paintings, which have since won the plause of all civilized nations. "The Plague of Egypt," "Fishermen on Shore in Squally Weather," "The Pier," "The Sun Rising Through the Clouds," and "Dido Building Carthage," were targets for critics to shoot at. In this of this outrageously abused man, a author of twenty-four years, just out of college, came forth with his essays, and wrote the ablest and most essays on art that the world ever saw. He will see—John Ruskin's "Modern Painters." For seventeen years the author fought the battles of the martyr artist, and after, in poverty and bereavement, the painter had died, the public tried to undo their cruelties to him by giving him a big funeral. A burial in St. Paul's Cathedral, his old friend took out of a tin box nineteen hundred and fifty pieces of paper containing drawings by the old painter, and through weary and uncompensated months sorted and arranged them for observation. People say John Ruskin's old days is cross, misanthropic and morbid. Whatever he may do he ought not to do, and whatever he says he ought not to say between his death, he will leave this world solvent as far as it has any capacity to pay this author's pen for its chivalrous Christian defense of a poor painter and a council. John Ruskin for William Turner. Blood for blood. Substitution!

What an exalting principle this leads one to suffer for another! No so kindles enthusiasm or awakens eloquence, or chimes poetic canto, or awakens nations. The principle is the doctrine in our religion—Christ the Martyr. Christ the celestial Hero, Christ the Defender, Christ the Substitute. Not principle, for it was as old as humanity; but now on a grander, wider, deeper, and more world-resounding scale. The shepherd boy as a champion of Israel with a sling toppled the giant Philistine braggadocio in the dust. Here is another David who, for the armies of churches militant and tripartite, hurls the Goliath of perdition to defeat, the crash of his brazen armor an explosion at Hell Gate. Abraham at God's command agreed to sacrifice his son Isaac, and the same God just in had provided a ram of the thickest substitute; but here is another bound to the altar, and no hand to the sharp edges of laceration and the universe shivers and quakes and recoils and groans at the horror.

All good men have for centuries been trying to tell whom this Substitution and every comparison, inspired and fired, evangelistic, prophetic, apostolic and human, falls short, for Christ is Great Unlike. Adam a type of Christ, because he came directly from Noah a type of Christ, because he saved his own family from the deluge; Jacob a type of Christ, because he was predecessor or successor; Joseph a type of Christ, because he was cast out of his brethren; Moses a type of Christ, because he was a deliverer from bondage; Aaron a type of Christ, because of his death to slay the lions and carry off the gates of impossibility; Solomon a type of Christ, in the affluence of his wisdom; Jonah a type of Christ, because of the stormy sea in which he threw himself for the rescue of others; but put together Adam and Noah and Melchisedec and Joseph and Moses and Joshua and Aaron and Solomon and Jonah, and you would not make a fragment of a Christ, a quarter of a Christ, the half of a Christ, or the millionth part of a Christ. Christ forsook a throne and sat down on a footstool. He came from the top of glory to the bottom of humiliation, and he drew a circumference seraphic for a circumference diabolic. Once waited on angels, now hissed at by brigands, he came down; and high up he came down; and his meteors swifter than they; by starry paths, himself more lustrous; past larger worlds to smaller worlds; down stairs of elements, and from cloud to cloud, and through tree-tops and into the camel's nostril to thrust his shoulder under our burden and take the lances of pain through our vitals, and wrapped himself in all the sorrows which we deserve for our misdeeds, and passed midnights on the mountain amid wild beasts of prey, and stood at the point where all earthly and infernal powers charged on him at once—our minute!

When did attorney ever endure so much for a pauper client, or physician for the patient in the lazaretto, or mother for the child in membranous croup, as Christ for us, as Christ for you, as Christ for me? In any man or woman or child in this universe who has ever suffered for another, find it hard to understand this Christ suffering for us? Shall those whose sympathies have been wrung in behalf of the unfortunate have no appreciation of that one moment which was lifted out of all the ages of eternity as most precious, when Christ gathered up all the sins of those to be redeemed under his right arm, and all his sorrows under his left arm, and said: "I will atone for thee under my right arm, and will heal all those under my left arm. Strike me with all thy glittering shafts, O Eternal Father! Roll over me with all thy surges, the seas of sorrow?" And the thunder struck him from above, and the seas of trouble rolled up from beneath, hurricane after hurricane, and cyclone after cyclone, and then and there in presence of heaven and earth and hell, yea, all worlds witnessing, the price, the bitter price, the transcendent price, the awful price, the glorious price, the infinite price, the eternal price, was paid that sets us free.

That is what Paul means, that is what I mean, that is what all those who have ever loved their heart changed mean by "blood." Cry ye to God that the hill back of Jerusalem was the battle-field on which Christ achieved our liberty!

The most exciting and overpowering day of one summer was the day I spent on the battle-field of Waterloo. Starting out with the morning train from Brussels, Belgium, we arrived in about an hour on the famous spot. A son of one who was in the battle, and who had heard from his father a thousand times the whole scene retold, accompanied us over the field. There stood the old Hougoumont Chateau, its walls dented, and scratched, and broken, and shattered by grape-shot and cannon-ball. There is the well in which the hundred dying and dead were pitched. There is the chapel with the head of the infant Christ shot off. There are the gates at which, for many hours, English and French armies wrestled. Yonder were the one hundred and sixty guns of the English, and the two hundred and fifty guns of the French. Yonder the Hanoverian Hussars died for the woods. Yonder was the ravine of Ohain, where the French cavalry, not knowing there was a hollow in the ground, rolled over and down, troop after troop, tumbling into one awful mass of suffering, hoof of kicking horses against brow and breast of captains and colonels and private soldiers, the human and the beastly groan kept up until the day after, all was shoveled under because of the malodor arising in that hot month of June.

"There," said our guide, "the Highland regiments lay down on their faces waiting for the moment to spring upon the foe. In that orchard twenty-five hundred men were cut to pieces. Here stood Wellington with white lips, and up that knoll rode Marshal Ney on his sixth horse, five having been shot under him. Here the ranks of the French broke, and Marshal Ney, with his boot slashed of a sword, and his hat off, and his face covered with powder and blood, tried to rally his troops as he cried: 'Come and see how a marshal of France dies on the battle-field.' Yonder is the field where Napoleon stood, his arm through the reins of the horse's bridle, dazed and insane, trying to go back." Scene from a battle that went on from twenty-five minutes to twelve o'clock, on the eighteenth of June, until four o'clock, when the English seemed defeated, and their commander cried out: "Boys, can you think of giving way? Remember old England!" and the tide turned, and at eight o'clock in the evening the man of destiny, who was called by his troops Old Two Hundred Thousand, turned away with broken heart, and the fate of centuries was decided.

No wonder a great mound has been reared there, hundreds of feet high—a mound at the expense of millions of dollars and many years in rising, and on the top is the great Belgian lion of bronze, and a grand old lion it is. But our great Waterloo was in Palestine. From twelve o'clock at noon to three o'clock in the afternoon the greatest battle of the universe went on. Eternal destinies were being decided. All the arrows of hell pierced our Chieftain, and the battle-axes struck him, until brow and cheek and shoulder and hand and foot were incarnadined with oozing life; but he fought on until he gave a final stroke and the commander-in-chief of hell and all his forces fell back in everlasting ruin, and the victory is ours. And on the mound that celebrates the triumph we plant this day two figures, not in bronze or iron or sculptured marble, but two figures of living light, the Lion of Judah's tribe and the Lamb that was slain.

Miss Ruby Hoge's Work among the Eastside Tenement Children; Bringing Joy into Lowly Little Lives.

SINCE the publication in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD several weeks ago, of the announcement that a new work had been undertaken at the Hall of the Bowery Mission, in connection with the little tenement children of the east-side, many readers have evinced a lively interest in the matter and have written to make inquiries. The work is under the care of Miss Ruby M. Hoge, a young Southern lady, who is now giving daily to classes of nearly one hundred east-side children, the benefit of her experience, as a trained Christian worker and kindergartner. It will be remembered that Miss Hoge's present undertaking was only recently begun, yet its success has been surprising beyond expectation. With the co-operation of the Bowery Mission, she established a Sewing School for girls under fifteen. It met every Monday and Thursday at 3 P.M. in the Bowery Mission Hall, and the programme included a brief Gospel service, singing, and prayer, followed by two hours of sewing lessons. The attendance averaged between fifty and sixty girls. But the work grew and soon a score of nationalities were represented. Then a daily Kindergarten was opened for taught that happiness is an essential atmosphere in early education, and also that every habit of life receives its direction while the child is yet in its unconscious and plastic stage; two truths so full of meaning, that we have not yet learned half their value, and upon which the kindergarten must rest. But this happiness must be an organizer of the child's faculties, or they run riot, because activity is the first principle of life, and cannot be repressed with safety. In order to secure organization, method must be employed, and Froebel's contributing to the new education was the formulating of such methods as would utilize the first instincts of activity in the child to produce or create something which is attractive to him—and which will, by the pleasurable sensation success gives, excite in him the desire to repeat the activity, not aimlessly, but to produce again the result. Thus the unconscious activity becomes a conscious and ever-increasing force, which, by being directed, as it develops into wholesome channels, presents that wholesale and indiscriminate use of power which is such a marked characteristic of the average child.

"The kindergarten offers such forms—beginning with the ball, the simplest of all forms—as the child can understand—and that represent such implements as are needed in mechanical and artistic work. No matter how many little children are in the streets needing the heart-culture of loving care, of bright clean rooms, and harmonizing play, their condition remains very much the same as the years glide on, and proper efforts are not put forth in their behalf. Business men have their boards, ministers their conferences, teachers their conventions, and politicians their caucuses, and these bodies of men and women discuss finance and business interests, the most effectual way of bringing the wayward and sinful into the fold, the best methods of instruction in the various branches of study, and the chances of electing candidates for office. And almost everything else is discussed that promises to undo, to control, or regulate the mistakes, mischiefs, and unfortunate conditions of life. Recognizing fully these important offices, and many other phases of helpful work, it is still true that all these are reformatory or charitable, and not primarily preventive, in the sense of beginning with the child to systematically arm and educate him for defense or attack. No body of men or women make it a business to trace back to their sources, with the view of preventing, rather than curing, enduring, or punishing the helplessness, misery, and crime that have called forth our gigantic charities, that tax legislation in vain for adjustment, and baffle our just efforts to protect ourselves.

"How prophetic sounds the reason Froebel gives for living with our children: 'That the new generation may be fitted for answering the questions which lie in wait for it—questions which the passing generation can never solve.' For these questions lying at our door for solution are greater than any that ever confronted society before. The quality of men is the test of civilization, and their integrity the full promise of all that is needed for answering these questions concerning social regeneration."

Miss Hoge will reply to any letters concerning the work that are addressed to her at The Bowery Mission, 105 Bowery, N.Y.

LAST OF THE SAMARITANS!

Pilgrimage to Their Ancient Seat on Mount Gerizim—"The Seven Crosses," the White Lambs and the Sacred Pentateuch.

THE HIGH PRIEST.

THE five candles which were placed in a tin pan and let down to illuminate the bottom of Jacob's well for a suitable bakhshish and for my benefit, having been extinguished and dinner enriched by vegetables from the Greek priest's garden having been enjoyed, we mounted our horses for the short journey to Nablus. The evening sun was bathing the Moslem house of prayer on the summit of Mt. Gerizim, as we rode in between Mt. Ebal and the Hill of Blessing. Right past the great natural amphitheatres facing each other on the opposite mountains, on past the Turkish arsenal, and the troops gathering for the Druse-destroying expedition, right on to the Latin monastery we went. When I reached Nablus the Samaritan Sabbath had just begun.

In the morning, determined not to fail seeing the place where the last of the Jewish sacrifices is celebrated, I went out to the west end of the city and ascended Mt. Gerizim. The road is steep and well filled with loose stones. Seven days before the feast of the Passover the Samaritans leave their homes, climb the mountain and encamp in a hollow near the top of Gerizim. Three times a year they make their pilgrimage to the holy mountain, but only at the Passover is there a sacrifice offered.

It is in the month of flowers, it is in the month Nisan, and at the full moon this feast is held. About an hour before sunset on the last day of the encampment, one hundred and eleven, which is the full number of the male Samaritans, gather at the place of the slaying of seven white lambs. (Most of the women remain in the tents.) Then Jacob Aaron, the High Priest, dressed in long flowing white priestly robes, steps upon a large stone and stands there barefooted, leading the congregation in chanting prayers or praises. During prayer the men stretch out their hands, bow, kneel and touch the ground with their forehead, much after the fashion of the Moslems. Seven white lambs having been driven into the circle by seven barefooted young men dressed in white, the history of the Exodus is recited in concert, faster and faster as the moment of sunset approaches. When the "orb of day" has touched the western sky-line, the seven young men suddenly unsheath their bright knives, lift them on high, they flash in the light of the setting sun for a moment and then across the throats of the innocent lambs. The slayers then dip their fingers in the blood and touch each Samaritan on the forehead and on the nose. Sometimes only the youngest are thus blood-stained. I noticed two holes dug at the place of sacrifice, one some distance from the other and twice as deep. I was told, on the spot how a fire is kindled in the deep hole, a kettle swung in and water boiled. The hot water is poured and thrown on the slain animals and the fleece removed. Afterwards a spit fashioned out of what is supposed to be pomegranate, about four lengthwise of each lamb. A shorter spit is either driven through the throat or else is fastened to the long piece where the throat is cut. The forefeet are stretched out and fastened to it, thus making a veritable cross and crucifixion. They are then taken to the more shadowy place and here having been made in it are put in and the hole covered over; here they remain until the flesh is well roasted. I must not omit mentioning that the right foreshoulders and entrails are flung aside and burned. The congregation employ themselves most of the time by chanting. By and by the lambs are taken out and held aloft, then one can behold the seven crosses. They are carried to the place of sacrifice where the people, having been supplied with bitter herbs and unleavened bread, hastily tear the flesh off and eat it. It is intended that all should wear white robes, have ropes tied around their waists, shoes on their feet and stones in their hands, thus fulfilling the Scripture requirements to the letter. (Meat is carried to the women in the tents.) After having eaten, the men search diligently for any morsels that may have fallen aside, and burn all that remains and then, according to Deut. 16:7, which says: "Thou shalt turn in the morning, and go unto thy tents," they depart to their homes.

A guard of fifty Turkish soldiers is frequently necessary to protect the Samaritans at the time of the sacrifice, from the excitable and fanatical Mohammedan residents of Shechem.

In Nablus is the famous Samaritan Pentateuch, which they claim was written by Aaron's great-grandson. It is not that old, but there seems to be good reason to believe that it is a trifle over two thousand years of age. It is kept in a costly case of silver which is wrapped about with a cover of fine venetian cloth. Some portions look older than others, due no doubt to the priests kissing Aaron's name. I called on the High Priest and was invited to the Sabbath closing service. The synagogue is a plain room about eighteen feet wide and thirty-two feet long, with arched ceiling and matting on the floor, which is not to be walked on with shoes. The service began at 6.00 P. M., and lasted till sunset.

Only male members attend. Just outside the door I counted 165 slippers. I surely miscounted, for the number must divide by two at any rate. There were over eighty males present, and as there are only one hundred and one all told, it is likely that every one of sufficient age was there. (I've seen nearly all of the living Samaritans.) All were dressed in long white robes, a beautiful sight, and as they sang in concert or chanted, or the priest would chant a sort of solo and the others join in on the chorus, it was impressive. It was not a lazy service. At prayer they would stand awhile, then kneel, then touch the matting with their faces.

I saw a man wait by the three trees in the court yard till a lad brought him water. He would not go to church till he washed his hands and feet. The twenty-five soap factories are not out of place where cleanliness is a part of religion. I was at a loss to know how each one would find his slip-

Another Plea for the Bird.

The recent publication in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of an article on "The Day," has awakened sympathetic interest in many quarters. Mrs. Geo. E. Fox

Loveland, Col., writes: "I was much pleased and interested in your article and its plea for our dumb friends. It seems few persons think much thought of birds and animals, the worm beneath our feet. So many ladies who are pers after service, for a small boy got among them and tried most of them on, and mixed things up considerably. My interpreter told a Samaritan lad to ask me for bakhshish. He quickly answered, and with emphasis: "It is the Sabbath."

In the morning, before climbing Mt. Gerizim, I called at the Samaritan quarter of Nablus, to inquire when I might have an interview with the High Priest, and was told "after the last Sabbath service." As I was going away a son of the priest, very confidentially accosted me, saying he would let me have a part of an ancient manuscript, but I must not mention it in the presence of the Samaritan elders. He informed me that he would show it to me after the Sabbath,—all of which was for the western man's money. After sunset I sat and drank coffee with the priests and elders. "How many Samaritans are there in the world, and where do they reside?" "They all live here," a priest answered, and continuing, he said: "There are two hundred and one now. Of that number one hundred and eleven are males and ninety are females. Our young men find it difficult to obtain wives. All except the priests may marry Jewish ladies, if they can get them." This last was said with a merry twinkle in the eye.

"Do you have any converts?" "His answer was simply the following question: 'Who would join the poor and the hated?'"

On the Sabbath day a Samaritan has no light or fire in his house, and hence no cooking. The Jews keep things warm in ashes, but the last of the Samaritans do not even that. The Chief Priest's wife passed by, and he remarked:

"That is my old woman."

I said, "Why don't the women go to the services in the Synagogue?"

He, knowing well the high regard in which women are held in the west, very shrewdly remarked, "There isn't room."

The fact is the women are not considered to have an interest in religion. Probably their souls are not as valuable as those possessed by the men. Women's souls are said to be of inferior quality.

There was an odor of good things cooking, and I concluded they were about to make up for the Sabbath fasting. The priests took me to see the old manuscript. It required two keys to get to it. One was eight inches long, the other only about four inches long. A contribution was expected.

The Samaritans claim to be very poor. They told me that years ago they were rich, but that they incidentally learned of a plot to murder them all. They took their gold and gave it to the Pasha, and he protected them. Hence they are poor fessed Christians, and who seem good and merciful, go about wearing dead leaves on their clothes, hats and bonnets. Sometimes I think if all the dead birds represented at the church services could gather in the class-room and have a testing meeting, so that people could understand it would open the eyes of some and make many a heart sad.

"Many of our women who wear aigrettes and wings and delicate plumes, are not aware what an evil they are sanctioning and encouraging. I see lovely Christian ladies with their bonnets trimmed with the delicate feathers of the white egret, and I often wonder if they think or have ever learned how these plumes are obtained. The gathering of these feathers means a harvest of pitiless, horrible death, because it is reaped at the sowing time of birds when it is the most helpless through its blind natural parent-love for its offspring, and when its death means the death of its young birdlings. Any observant person who will take notice of the plumes worn on the heads of so many women should know that the slaughter of these birds involves not thousands but millions, as there are but few plumes to each bird that can be used, and it is only at the nesting time that they are fit for the market. It is stated as a fact that one merchant in New York City employs yearly from forty to sixty gunners, and it is not uncommon thing for one man to kill a hundred birds a day for days in succession.

"Every good woman should shun the responsibility of carrying aloft the trophies of such wicked work, and no doubt would, were it not for mere ignorance or thoughtlessness. Neither would a mother put into her little boys' hands such toys as swords, whips, air-guns, etc., if it is with these play weapons that the child learns his first lessons in cruelty."

Dwarfs of the Pamir.

The discovery of a singular race of dwarfs is reported by two Danish explorers who have lately returned from the hitherto unvisited portions of the vast lands called the Pamir. The trail of dwarf people are still fire worshippers without a knowledge of the proper use of money.

The travelers have some hundred photographs proving their story, and they tell of the timid, elusive habits of these little people who hide at the approach of strangers tallies with the reports of the primitive dwarfs in Morocco aroused such interest a few years ago.

HEROIC PERSONALITIES

By REV. LOUIS ALBERT BANKS, D.D.

"The Good Luck House."

SEVENTEEN years ago Mrs. Alice N. Lincoln, a young lady of high culture and refinement, and with means at her command to live at ease and indifference to the world's reproach, if she had so pleased, became deeply interested in the pitiable condition of many of the poorer people in the

it was still more profitable, the net sum at the end of the year being $157.47. Mrs. Lincoln still carries on the administration of "The Good Luck House," and no queen was ever treated with more genuine respect than she is there. She is regarded as a most practical sort of patron saint to the institution. Yet there is no element of charity suggested in her dealings with her tenants. It is simply Christian justice. She seeks with great care to help them retain their self-respect, and treats them as fully her equal in personal responsibility. The rent is required to be paid regularly. One rigid rule enforced upon all tenants is cleanliness. She pays for the weekly scrubbing of the halls and stairways, but the tenants are required to sweep them every day in turn. The sinks and drains are kept clean. All this has a marvelous effect on the home habits of the inmates; and I have seen as clean and tidy rooms in "The Good Luck" tenement-house as I have seen anywhere, and that, too, on days when they were caught unawares, it not being the regular rent-day.

Mrs. Lincoln has a conscience, and justly feels that if six per cent. interest is enough for business men to pay on money borrowed, it is enough for poor people to pay on their investments in rents, and so all the profits above six per cent. she puts into the bank as an emergency fund, and from time to time, the tenants have been permitted to share some unexpected pleasure from this.

Turkey's Doom Foreshadowed Europe Sick of the Sultan's Misgovernment and Massacres—The Cretan Crisis.

ALTHOUGH the threatened European war over the Turko-Grecian troubles in Crete seems to have been averted for the moment, the danger of an armed conflict that may involve even the so-called "great powers," is still far from being safely past. Turkey and Greece are not less hostile toward each massed near the Greek frontier, while the latter government has fully seventy thousand. Both forces are well supplied with war material, but the general condition of the Greek troops is said to be much inferior to that of the Sultan's forces. Yet

Paghtchi on the Bosphorus. The other boats found safe anchorage in the Golden Horn. As no Turk was deemed competent to act as admiral of this newly-organized navy, Hobart Pasha, a bluff Englishman and expert seaman, was put in charge. It was only by the most persistent appeals that, once a year, vessels the Turks, as all history shows, are brave soldiers and their qualities in the field need not be underestimated. Should a land campaign take place between the two nations, without outside allies or interference, it is the general opinion of European military experts that Turkey's troops would be strong enough to overrun the peninsula.

On the other hand, a sea campaign, without interference could hardly fail to result in a triumph for Greece. This accurate description of Turkey's once powerful navy is furnished to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by a gentleman who has an intimate acquaintance with that branch of the Sultan's armament:

A battered remnant of rusty iron-clads, renovated torpedo boats and antique transports,—twenty-nine all told—even when dilated by the glowing imagery of Turkish official parasites, lie to-day idly rocking in the Golden Horn, as impotent for offence or defence as so many wash-tubs. Twenty-two years ago, were permitted to leave their anchorage and slip up to the Black Sea for a brief series of manoeuvres. When in May, 1876, Redif Pasha forced his way into Abdul Aziz's presence, and told him that he was no longer Pashah, the Sultan rushed to his window only to find, that, in the irony of fate, his own ships had been selected to carry out coercive measures, and were now turning their grim batteries against their former master.

In the recent crisis, the chief of the navy, Hassan Pasha, the successor of Hobart Pasha has, under advice of the Minister of Marines, "prepared his ironclads for action." Advice from Constantinople say that after repeated discussions at Yildiz Kiosk respecting the fleet, its inefficiency is at last admitted by the issuing of an order directing it "to remain for the present in the Golden Horn."

Greece's navy, though comparatively small, is compact and modern. While it cannot be compared for a moment even with the second-rate navies of Europe, it is clearly more than able to cope with the ill-conditioned Turkish warships.

Since Germany's warships appeared off Canea, all the six great powers are represented in Cretan waters, though in varying strength. Great Britain has sixteen vessels on the spot—six being battleships—with Rear-Admiral Harris in command on board the Revenge. Italy has nearly twenty vessels present, her commander, Admiral Canevaro, as senior officer, directing international operations. Russia, Austria, and France are also represented. None of the Greek ships are very large; indeed, the most servicable seems to be the corvette, Navarchos Miaulis, armed with six-inch guns, which fired the first Greek shot in the struggle. The torpedo flotilla, brought on the scene by Prince George, musters some half-dozen smart little boats, with more in reserve at home. They are German built and carry four one-pounders apiece. Prince George himself is on board the royal yacht, Sphacteria. Meanwhile, a good deal of desultory fighting has been going on in Crete, the advantage resting with the insurgents, who seem more than a match for Turkish garrisons.

While the varying international kaleidoscope may change the complexion of affairs in Eastern Europe and bring to pass either war or peace, there is little doubt that in the present trouble, the pluck and resolution evinced by Greece will yet accrue to her permanent advantage. Her courage—all other considerations apart—was displayed in a righteous cause; for religion and liberty. She has won the sympathy of the liberty-loving peoples, and France, England, and Italy, at least, as Christian governments, have been compelled by popular opinion to decline supporting coercive measures against her in Crete and the Piraus, while Russia, Germany, and Austria have ranged themselves on the side of the Turk and against Greece.

MRS. ALICE N. LINCOLN.

poor houses of Boston. She set her face with heroic determination to do what was within her power to better the condition of these poor people. She hired a house in the heart of Slum-dom. It contained twenty-seven tenements, and she paid one thousand dollars a year rent the first year and afterward twelve hundred. The house had a bad reputation, and had been for some time under the ban of the police.

It was, at the time she took it, half empty, because of the degraded character of the occupants. Its entries and corridors were blackened with smoke and dingy and uninviting. The sinks were in dark corners, and were foul and disease-breeding. The stairways were innocent of water or broom, and throughout the entire house, from top to bottom, ceilings, walls, stairways—everything was dirty and neglected. It was surely not an attractive task to attempt to bring cleanliness and order out of such chaos, but this resolute young reformer bravely set herself to perform the seemingly impossible. The interior was painted, improved means of lighting and ventilating the sinks were ordered, and wood and coal closets arranged for each tenement on its own landing.

Previously the tenants had to keep their fuel in the cellar. The mouldy paper was removed from the entries and a fresh surface of plastering was put on. A few of the worst tenements had to be removed, but the majority, pleased with the new administration of things, were willing to accept its rules and remain. Tenants were soon found for every room; and this house, which had been regarded as very unhealthy, and had been a regular hive for reformers under the old regime of carelessness and greed, that did not care how dirty the tenants were so long as they paid their rent, under the new administration became so healthy that disease was almost unknown, and was, as is to this day, known by the tenants, as "the neighborhood generally, as "The Good Luck House."

During all these eighteen years Mrs. Lincoln has collected her own rents, and kept everything well under her own supervision. A close account was kept of all receipts and expenditures, and at the end of the first year the balance of cash in hand was $111.67, or more than eleven per cent. on the investment. The second year other than at any time since the beginning of the embroglio. Their land and naval forces are straining every nerve to reach the full requirements of an active war footing, and while the coasts and harbors of Crete no less than those of the Grecian Archipelago are patrolled by armed warships—those of King George, among the number—the mountain chain which constitutes the European border land between Turkey and Greece, is covered with the armed forces of the two rival nations. The former has 90,000 men

Sultan Aziz, in his first spasmodic attempt at reform, determined to improve the old Turkish proverb, "God gave the land to the Turk, and the sea to the Giaour," by making the Turk the custodian of the sea as well. To this end, he invested in a dozen of the finest iron-clads England could produce, paying a most exorbitant price. These named for the various members of his family, were the pride of his royal heart, and in their possession he felt his kingdom an acknowledged maritime power. So highly did Sultan Aziz value these novel toys, that like a child he could not bear them out of his sight. Some were kept riding at anchor in front of his marble palace of Dolma-

India.

INDIA, now the scene of famine, plague and suffering, is a land where the Gospel has already won wonderful triumphs. Calcutta is the headquarters of Bishop Thoburn's work, and what Bishop Heber did in his day, Bishop Thoburn is now doing for the gospelization of India. I saw some of his schools and preached to many of his people, and got facts in regard to what is being done here and throughout India by consecrated men and women, enough to thrill all Christendom with gladness. Thousands of native converts in India every year under the Methodist missions, thousands of native converts under the Baptist missions, and a vast number under all the missions every year. But more than that, Christianity is undermining heathenism, and not a city, or town, or neighborhood of India but directly or indirectly feels the influence, and the day speeds on when Hindooism will go down with a crash. There are whole villages which have given up their gods, and where not an idol is left. The serfdom of womanhood is being loosened, and the iron grip of caste is being relaxed. Human sacrifices have ceased, and the last spark of the last funeral pyre has been extinguished, and the wheel of the Juggernaut has ceased to crush. All India will be taken for Christ. If anyone has any disheartenments let him keep them as his own private property—he is welcome to all of them. But if any man has any encouragements to utter, let him utter them. What we want is less croaking owls of the night, and more morning larks with spread wing, ready to meet the advancing day. Fold up now Naomi and Windham, and give us Ariel, or Mt. Pisgah, or Coronation!

Glad am I that the last thing I did in Calcutta was to preach that Gospel which is to save India, and to save the world. With what interest I looked over the pulpit into the dark faces of these natives, and saw them illumined with heavenly anticipation. While yet they were seated I took my departure for a railroad train.

And now as to the industrious malignment of missionaries. It has been said by some travelers after their return to America or England, that the missionaries are leading a life full of indolence and luxury. That is a falsehood that I would say is as high as heaven if it did not go down in the opposite direction. So far from living in idleness, no men on earth work so hard as the missionaries in the foreign field.

Against fearful odds, and with three millions of Christians opposed to two hundred and fifty millions of Hindoos, Mohammedans and other false religions, these missionaries are trying to take India for God. Let the good people of America, and England, and Scotland, and of all Christendom add ninety-nine and three-quarters per cent. to their appreciation of the fidelity and consecration of foreign missionaries. Far away from home, in an exhausting climate, and compelled to send their children to England, Scotland or America so as to escape the corrupt conversation and behavior of the natives, these men and women of God toil on until they drop into their graves. But they will get their chief appreciation when their work is over and the day is won, as it will be won. No place in heaven will be too good for them. Some of the ministers at home who live on salaries of $4,000 to $5,000 a year, preaching the Gospel of him who had not where to lay his head, will enter heaven and be welcomed, and while looking for a place to sit down, they will be told: "Yonder in that lower line of thrones you will take your places. Not on the thrones nearest the King; they are reserved for the missionaries!"

Withhold Criticism.

AS soon as a man becomes prominent in official position he is the target to be shot at. We have in this country great profusion of anathema for our officials when they make mistakes, but not one word for official well-doing. We curse better than we bless. We never do a public man justice until he is dead and there is no danger of his ever being a candidate for alderman in our ward! By funeral eulogium we try to atone for all the lies we told about him while he was living. Everybody praises General Jackson now, but when alive he was hung in effigy in every city. We wait until we have put a heavy marble slab on a man, and it is certain he cannot get up from under the burden, and then Massachusetts Legislature passes resolutions of praise for Charles Sumner in the same hall where a little while before they had passed resolutions of insulting denunciation. We caricature Horace Greeley in the pictorials as no man ever was caricatured, and call him a crazy fool until he puts down his thunderbolt of a pen forever, and then we get the President of the United States to attend his funeral, and blockade Broadway from Grace Church to the Battery with sympathizers. Mr. Webster, while he lives, is "Black Dan;" after his death he is the "Great Expounder of the Constitution." The war president is "Old Abe" while he lives; after death he is the "Saviour of his Country." Now I say, let our public men, whether they do well in affairs municipal or national, hear plauditory echo. Praise never hurts a well-balanced man, but augments him.

The Printing Press.

NATION rises no higher than its literature. The cylinder of the printing press is the high water mark of civilization. Correct the world's literature and you correct its morals. Tell me what a man or a woman reads, and I will tell you the style of moral character, without, in ten thousand cases, an exception. No one ever read continuously bad books without becoming bad. No one ever continuously read good books without becoming good. A thousand dollars reward for anyone who is regularly reading corrupt novels and yet keeping either his religion or his morals. The most charming road to perdition is through a Parisian book stall. Watch the trade sales if you want to mark the rise and the fall of the great oceanic tides of moral feeling. When you pray for the Church and the school-house, let the most important paragraph of your supplication be for the purification of the American printing press. Long live all good books and newspapers!

APOSTLES OF SPRING.

NATURE is now busy making a new Spring. There is no sound of trumpets about her work, no noise of axe or hammer, no smoke of factory or forge; and yet her wondrous toil goes on, without rest and without haste. An inscrutable, irresistible force is busy on every side of us, and the hard-trodden sod before our doors, is moved aside by slender, needle-like shafts, that will bend and blow with the faintest breeze. A miracle! Yes, indeed, a miracle before which science is dumb.

"The grass that tarrieth not for man" is everywhere, and we may go now into our brown gardens, and look for that beautiful brotherhood of floral Apostles, which year after year, bring us "glad tidings" of the coming Spring. Snowdrops, and Crocus buds, and daffodils, and violets, those sweet advent preachers that tell us although the bare shrubs shiver yet against the window panes, it will not be long, ere the twinkling streams, and fresh green fields, shall lie

Under clear skies of blue.

It is ages since God spoke by the Urim and Thummim, but these snowdrops, with their bells of light hanging in white perfection, are fresh from his fingers to-day. Reverently and lovingly then, let us accept the lessons they teach, the memories they enshrine; the hopes they foster, praying as we stand above them,

Make thou our spirits pure and clear

As the first snowdrops of the year.

Like day-stars against the white loveliness of the snowdrops, are the gold and purple crocus buds. Imagine now, the hills that look on the Levant the landscapes of Greece and old Ionia, the fields of Italy and Spain, and the sweet, green meadows of England all like "fields of cloth of gold" with the yellow crocus. Some Palmer, or Knight of the Crusades, brought the crocus to England; and the yellow and purple flowers in Cambridgeshire and Nottinghamshire, overrunning the meadows in gold and purple patches, taught Mary Howitt to sing for us:

Like lilac flame its color glows,
Tender, and yet so clearly bright,
That all for miles and miles about,
The splendid meadow shineth out;
And far off village children shout
To see the welcome sight!

A very little later the daffodils may be found in the shelters of the evergreens:

Daffodils

That come before the swallow dares, and take
The winds of March with beauty; and make the whole garden-place joyful. In Cumberland and Westmoreland daffodils have the lovely names of "Lent lilies," and "chalice flowers," the first because they flower in Lent; the second, from their nectaries being shaped like the chalice at the Communion Table. Lent lilies, in spite of their sunny color, have melancholy memories. They were the flower that the frightened girl Proserpina let fall from Dis's wagon in her terror; and Milton makes them fill

Their cups with tears

To strew the laurel hearse where Lycid lies;
while Herrick, in a poem that is almost a prayer, thus beseeches them:

Fair daffodils! We weep to see
Ye haste away so soon;
As yet the early rising sun
Has not attained his noon.

Stay! stay!

Until the hasting day
Has run;

But to the even-song:
And having prayed together, we Will go with ye along.

"Gather we violets now," and then we can afford to wait until we see Flora peering into April's front. Violets, whose looks are like the skies, whose very name hath a garden in it; whose memory is a dwelling-place of dim woods and green secluded places. Violets, on whose rare-limbed, scented leaves, is written one of the most poetical chapters of humanity's great epic! In heraldry, they are the device of fair and modest girlhood, with the sweet and appropriate motto, "I must be sought after." What more exquisite emblem for a maiden than

Upon her heart that never yet felt trouble

A bunch of violets, full blown and double!
serenely sleeping. In poetry they ally themselves with all things fair and sweet; Milton and Shakespeare dedicate to this entrancing flower some of their daintiest conceits; as when Shakespeare would praise delicious music he says,

Oh! it came o'er my ear like the sweet south

That breathes upon a bank of violets,

Stealing and giving odor!

or still more exquisitely in the "Winter's Tale,"

Violets dim,

But sweeter than the lids of Juno's eyes,
Or Cytherea's breath.

Barry Cornwall says that "the violet stands first always with a lover;" and therefore, as lovers never die, violets are perennially beloved.

Persia, Syria, Greece, France, England vie with America in their love for this little flower; and yet, but for its fragrance, we had not known there was so sweet a thing hid in the gloomy shade. But, lowly as it is, Mahomet chose it as the symbol of his faith; it was also the emblem of the first Napoleon, and is yet in Paris the badge of all who favor a free and liberal form of government. So we can all wear violets, and yet it is for us them a still nobler meaning—we can wear them in remembrance of the unobtrusive and meek content of woodland which bless the passer-by with their fragrance and give as angels give—unseen.

Very soon our spring flowers will every one of them be but a memento, yet each in turn has brought us the odor coming summer, the glory of days reborn; they have given us sweet hope perfect year with its splendor of the flowers, and its wealth of the autumn grain. And herein is a parable which a read who hold communion with nature shall find their Maker there:

To teach their listening heart.

Rev. W. E. Geil has been holding services at Chelsea, Mass. The services were in the Cary Avenue Baptist Church, of which C. C. Pieri is pastor. Mr. Pieri writes us that more than two hundred persons, many of whom young men, made profession of faith while services continued.

The Commercial of Buffalo, N. Y., that Rev. Jacob Freshman, had the joy on communion Sunday of receiving into church ship thirty new members, of whom twenty admitted on confession. Revival services commenced in the West Avenue Presbyterian Church of which he is pastor and are progressing.

At a recent festival of the American at Athens the Capital of Greece, a well-known professor of that city, came forward and that he had been, many years ago, a little school; that he himself and every Greek knew of the school felt very grateful to the cans for what they had done and were still for Greece.

During the past few weeks successful revival meetings have been held in Providence, Church, Scranton, Pa. The meetings were under the charge of the pastor, Wm. Edgar. He was assisted by neighboring pastors who rendered valuable service. Over seventy bowed at the altar of penitence, and fifty-two have joined on probation. Others soon follow. The church is greatly encouraged.

Evangelist Arthur Crane, of Plainfield, has been conducting revival services at Canton, N. Y. The central meetings were held in the House, with overflow meetings in the Baptist and Methodist Churches. Three services were held daily. It is estimated that the additions to the churches will aggregate four hundred. Crane went thence to Bridgeton, N. J.

The Rev. J. Hudson Taylor, founder of the China Inland Mission, states that after a study of reports and statistics he is justified in belief that not less than 20,000 Chinese have converted to Christianity through the agency of the mission since its establishment in 1865. The past three years, 200 missionaries have added to the staff of the Mission.

The Christian Endeavor Societies continue with the Disciples of Christ are pressing forward educational lines. At the convention in New York a special reading course for them was suggested, and a committee has reported a plan, which with approval at the convention at Springfield in October. This report emphasizes three Bible study, the study of missions, and the study of the history and purpose of the denomination.

The Waldensian colony at Valdesse, Italy, celebrated their emancipation day, February 1, by laying the corner stone of a new church, known as the Bethany Waldensian Church. At a time of great rejoicing, not only the colony itself sharing in the exercises, but many from the country around. It is reported that the colony is to be largely re-enforced in the spring by many as 1,000 Waldensians planning to come Italy.

Evangelist Grant C. Tullar is holding revival services in Brooklyn, N. Y. The revival was recently by the work in the Western Presbyterian Church suggested a project for work to include the other churches in the district. The Strong Baptist, South Congregational, the Tabernacle Baptist and Pilgrim Chapel are working with the Westminster Presbyterian in the series. Meetings commenced March 10th and continued for two weeks.

The new Babi religion is spreading rapidly through Persia. It is estimated that in towns and villages half the population are Babis. There are probably 800,000 of them in the country. This is, in itself, a clear indication that the light of Persia are already, in large measure, won over to Islam, and anxious for a higher, holier, more spiritual faith. Almost all through the country the Babis are quite friendly to Christianity. The rise of this faith is in a large measure due to the spread of the Gospel, the best of their doctrines are borrowed from it, while they openly recognize the Scriptures and profess to be ready to accept any opinion they may hold when once proved contrary to the Bible.

HUNTER'S PARADISE.

Colorado Country and Its Abundant Game — A Picturesque Camp in the Wild Woods.

EVERY passing year witnesses a perceptible diminution of the once abundant large game of our Western States. There was a time, not so very long ago, when buffalo were found in vast numbers on the plains, and bear and deer in the Colorado country—a term employed by hunters and miners to indicate the extensive tract through which the Colorado river flows, and which was formerly one of the best game fields in the world, although it is no longer. But while much of the larger game, including bear and deer, has vanished, there is still enough left to satisfy the love of adventure. Streams are alive with fish, and there is nothing finer to tempt the appetite than a dish of mountain trout, caught in the liming and swirling waters. Our illustration shows a party of campers in the Colorado country. Every summer finds many such camps in the lands that are still open to the sportsman. It is a healthful and invigorating life, out there in the woods, with no terror of the summer heat and far from the turmoil of traffic and business. Camping in such a place, however, is by no means a simple or inexpensive affair. Such a party needs a good supply of victuals to supplement the proceeds of the hunt, which are sometimes rather meagre. Besides there are the expenses of guides, and the cost of transportation of tents, boxes and traps to be taken into account. Still, so much is gained in reinvigorated bodies, strengthened muscles and healthily bronzed faces that a season's camping, under advantageous circumstances, is a good investment. It has been the means of prolonging many a life.

Wildish Self-Reliance.

If trained to the habit of doing things for itself, it is surprising how soon a child will develop the ability of self-reliance. Too many parents, like nursery-maids, says a thoughtful writer, imagine that they know better than it is good for a baby to look at than he knows for himself. In this way a child is usually taught to depend upon others for amusements and occupations, instead of being satisfied with his own resources. How much pleasanter it is to follow the natural bent of our minds and do a thing the time we are inclined to do it. Children, though easily diverted, have the same natural instinct, and are often made peevish and fretful by having this innate longing frustrated. As far as possible, the child's natural inclinations should be permitted free course. If he enjoys tossing a ball and seeing it rebound, let him exhaust at pleasure for himself. He will then have a sense of contentment and satisfaction, which is utterly wanting when his attention is constantly distracted by new objects being thrust upon it.

the Real Kindergarten Spirit.

One wishing to become a kindergartner need in no wise enter into the spirit of the work, says Harriet L. Coolidge in Trained Motherhood, unless she is willing to become as a little child. Added to this, she would have a heart full of love, a throat full of music, an imaginative brain from which to draw lovely stories, and last, but not least, the patience of Job. Now do not be discouraged if you have not these; go and live, not for a few hours only, but for days and weeks, among little children and learn of them. The world is beginning to wake up to the fact that the Master was right when he placed a little child in the midst of his disciples as a pattern and guide. If mothers would study themselves and their children, make every nursery a child-garden, they and the fathers as the gardeners, they can make what they will of this plastic clay. They, and they only, are the ones to begin the training.

A Day at the White House.

ate in them the appetite for drink. He said: "Men who drink liquor, like others, will die, and if there is no new appetite created, our counters will be empty, as will also be our coffers. Our children will go hungry, or we must change our business to that of some other more remunerative. The open field for the creation of this appetite is among the boys. After men have grown, and their habits are formed, they rarely ever change in this regard. It will be needful, therefore, that missionary work be done among the boys; and I make the suggestion, gentlemen, that nickels expended in treats to the boys now, will return in dollars to your tills after the habit has been formed."

A Royal Family's Home Life.

At the present time, when the eyes of the world are turned toward brave little Greece, it may interest our readers to peruse this short description of the personalities at the royal home in Athens. The royal family spend part of their time at the palace there, and part at the palace at Tatoi, their country residence. Tatoi is a very pretty place, situated in a valley and accessible by a small railway running from the palace to Kephissia. The life led by the king and queen is a very simple one. King George has his rooms in the palace decorated with fine bronzes, marbles and paintings, and a few portraits of Hellenes. There he spends his time in GATHERING HOME.

OUT of the cradle of mansions,
Out of the tenements cold,
One by one, the little ones
Are gathering into the fold.
Round the great White Throne they're thronging.
These babies of earth so fair;
They hear the voices of angels,
And join in the songs over there.
At the feet of Christ they are learning
The lessons earth cannot teach,
Up to his great hand of kindness
Their tiny hands they reach.
And lean their heads on his bosom,
He'll bless them there, we know,
"Of such is the kingdom of heaven."
For they love and trust him so.
Then out of the cradle of mansions,
Out of the tenements cold,
The babies of earth are coming
To fill a place in the fold.

In Burmese Homes.

IT is a remarkable fact that Burmah differs from almost all other Oriental countries in the freedom accorded to its women. They stand in every way almost on an equality with men, so far as law, religion and custom are concerned. Girls share equally with boys in all inheritance, and they inherit property absolutely. There are no trustees between a woman and her property, and when she marries, she retains it, her husband having no legal control over it nor over her. Children are not so much ordered in Burmah, as guided and cared for, and when comparatively young, they are practically given control over their own doings—not without sound advice from their elders, but there is little command and no compulsion.

Although the Burmese women are not beautiful according to the accepted idea, yet to those who know them, they possess in a great degree the attractions of womanliness. Their voices are soft and sweet, and their manners quiet and self-restrained. Their complexion is fairer than that of the men and their eyes large and brown. Nearly all the women of the class above the peasants can read and write, but they are not so universally educated as are the boys, because they are not allowed to go to the monastery schools where the boys are taught.

Burmese women may be said to have no accomplishments. They are not taught music nor any of the light accomplishments that are valued by Western women, but in household matters they are thoroughly acquainted and all weave, cook and sew and some embroider. A girl does not have many amusements. She may go to the river, where there are boat-races and festivals of different sorts; but they have no "games" for young folks. In every household, the daughter has her appointed work and in all but the richer merchants' homes it is the daughter's duty to bring the water from the well, morning and evening. This well is the gossiping-place of the village and here are told the latest news and the little chatter of the place. In almost every house there is a loom and the girls weave their own dresses and those of their parents.

Teaching on Daughters.

Teach her all that is possible of everything good and useful, writes Elizabeth Scott Droke, in the Religious Telescope. . . . Then having mastered the ordinary education, take her to the kitchen. Teach her to make good wholesome bread. See that she understands the conditions under which typhoid lurks in the dishrag, and the kitchen sink. Having graduated from the kitchen, let her advance to the dining-room. Here she should attend to all the appointments of the table and serve the family from soup to dessert. Seek to instill and to foster within her a due regard for the sweet small courtesies of life which everywhere and under all circumstances mark the perfect lady.

CAMPING OUT IN THE COLORADO COUNTRY.

White House conservatories. If he sends a telegram, it is done from an instrument in the White House. His stationery and postage are also furnished. If he wants to take a drive his stables are amply equipped, all being paid for by the government. When he enters his business office, a man is stationed at the door to open and close it, and a private secretary, to whom the government pays a salary of $5,000 a year, assists him with his correspondence; also a typewriter. He is protected from the curious by a number of private watchmen. His steward does the marketing without cost to him. Yet with all these conveniences ready to his hand, there is not an hour of the day he can call his own. He is the people's servant, and must hold himself subject to their call at all hours. His Cabinet, the heads of departments, Congress, statesmen and visitors from many parts of the country, the demands of private and official correspondence, and lastly, the ceaseless round of social obligations, all leave him with hardly an hour of the twenty-four at his disposal, save those that are passed in slumber.

A Wholesome Warning.

In a recent address by an officer of the Ohio Liquor League, delivered at a public meeting in that state, the diabolical suggestion was made that the boys should be degraded by "treating," in order to cre-study. Twice a week the king receives all callers who have asked for an interview. These he usually receives in his own private room on the ground floor, where he is seated beside a table covered with papers and letters. Those who call on him find him very frank and pleasant. During a conversation, a caller may contradict him without the least fear of angering him. When he married the Grand Duchess Olga, who is a member of the Greek Church, he pleased the people greatly. She, through her benevolent work and charitable institutions, has won the love of the Greeks as her husband has. Their six children are all very popular, and altogether the family is one of the happiest royal groups in Europe.

THE SUNNY SIDE.

TAKE the sunny side of the road
Walk through the gracious light;
Yonder, heavy grey shadows stay,
But there God's yellow sunbeams play,
And make it glad and bright.
Take the sunny side of the street—
Step through the golden rain,
Perchance it's there that you will meet
The children with small, dancing feet
Bringing you joy again.
He who in sunlight thus abides
See rainbows through his tears
And turning out what'er betides,
A face that all its sorrow hides,
He conquereth the years.

THE KING'S HIGHWAY

A STORY OF THE BROADER CHRIST-LIFE

BY

AMELIA E. BARR.

HERE was also a better feeling between Mr. Lloyd and his errant son. The older man could not forget the bold recklessness of Steve's philippic at the socialistic meeting. He liked it. He felt a pride in his manner and his eloquence, and he smiled involuntarily whenever he thought of Steve's defense of himself, and his description of rich men in general. Then he usually permitted his mind to wander away in speculations which ended with the admission, "Steve is no such fool as one would think. He could manage my business, with my advice, just as well as he does his mother's trumpery benevolences—if he would—if he would—if his ideas about money were not all aslip and aslant, and if he was not as stubborn as a mule." So that as far as his home went, many years had passed since Steve had been able to visit it with so much satisfaction.

But when it came to his actual marriage with Jessie, Steve did not get the sympathy that he expected. Both Mrs. Lloyd and Alice felt as if there was hurry and mistake. When they had first thought of a wife for Steve it was as a last hope for his respectability; a kind of heroic treatment for which there now appeared no necessity. Jessie had gone out of date. They felt it difficult to accept her. Good women as they were, they were not above imagining Jessie's pride and satisfaction in finding out that she had captured the son of a millionaire in entertaining an unknown guest. They spoke of it to themselves with little sighs, and Alice, who had some imagination, pictured Jessie's excitement and pride in a variety of ways.

In reality the girl had taken the denouement in a very different manner to any of Alice's suppositions. On that night when Nicholas Lloyd so unconsciously assisted in it, Steve, after seeing his father home, went directly to the McAslins to finish the explanation. It was a little difficult for John to accept it, but he was honest enough to realize that his own hopes about Alice made this difficulty. Steve then went exhaustively into the circumstances that had made him a wanderer, and when John complained, and with some reason, of the confidence withheld from his best friends, Steve fortified his position by a positive assurance that his only motive had been a desire to win Jessie's affection without a suspicion of money influencing her. He then explained the purpose, and the payment of his mother's proposal, and showed the ring she had sent Jessie and the check given for their home making.

So John put the little selfish ache in his heart down below all show of feeling, and gave Steve his hand in token of their renewed friendship and alliance. There had evidently been an effort of some evil influence to thwart Steve's happiness, but his clear honesty drove away all suspicions. And pray, how many of us are proof against the prospect and power of money? Mr. and Mrs. McAslin were both excited over the circumstance. Mrs. McAslin's pride being also strongly tinged with a pious sentimentality. Considering her early relations with Nicholas Lloyd, and his cruelty to her, she found it easy and satisfactory to relegate the whole affair to a just and retributive Providence. She was so anxious for Jessie's return that she could not sleep by night nor eat by day, and the solemn importance of her countenance impressed her daughter before she had taken the pins out of her hat.

"What is the matter, mother?" she asked nervously. "Has anything gone wrong? Has any one done wrong? You look as if you had more to carry than you could bear."

"A very strange thing has happened, Jessie. We have found out something about Steve."

"You have found out nothing wrong, I am sure, mother. I won't believe that you have done that. I won't!

I won't!"

"His name is not Morrison. Morrison is only his middle name."

"What of that? I am going to marry Steve, right or wrong,—and I do not fear any wrong that may come through him. If his name is not Morrison, pray what is it?"

"Lloyd!"

"Hum! it might be worse, and it might be better; that is if names have any influence over the people that bear them. I wonder if he is any relative of the Nicholas Lloyds?"

"He is the son of Nicholas Lloyd."

"O! the brother of Alice Lloyd, then?"

"Yes."

"I am rather glad of it. That accounts for much and sundry!" Poor Jessie! Her face flushed rosy, her whole attitude became suffused with a well controlled but haughty satisfaction. She felt that she must be alone in order to realize properly the good fortune that had come to her.

When Steve came home to dinner she was shy but gracious. She had put on her best dress and given her appearance an air of holiday. He took her part at once. He gave her his mother's ring and message, and showed her the generous check which was to prepare their home. The interest of all this was so wonderful and so great, that dinner was half over when they came hand in hand to the table. Their eyes were shining with happy tears; they were above and beyond hunger; they had had food to eat that God gives but rarely in life—the food of heaven—the satisfying joy of perfect love. Indeed they could talk as little as they could eat. They were too happy to say how happy they were. But it was Steve only that felt that sensitive deprecation of great happiness which fears to wound by too much evidence of joy before those who are less fortunate.

The weeks which followed these incidents were weeks of unparalleled pleasure to Jessie. She selected her own home, an uptown flat, with all the adornments and conveniences which have taught people with limited incomes unlimited extravagance. Then she necessarily furnished it up to the walls, and mantels and mirrors, showing such exquisite taste and delight in the work that Steve could not find it in his heart to name the expense to her. Her wedding garments also were to order, and between the house and the modiste, she found herself every night exceedingly weary and exceedingly happy. A street costume of dark silk that could do service afterwards had been Jessie's first idea of a wedding gown, but the house so enlarged her conceptions of what was beautiful and proper, that the dark silk was given up for white satin. Then the small home wedding, with only their most intimate friends present, was resigned; the white satin dress asked for a church ceremonial, to which every one she knew could be invited.

These changes came so naturally and so gradually, and were so bewitchingly advised that Steve had no power to deny his sanction. "You see, Steve," she argued, "anybody can go to a church. There will be no sense of degradation in going there, but your family would not like to come to a little flat near St. Mark's Place, and it would be a great pity to begin our relationship with a sense of scorn and a feeling of unkindness. We must keep good friends, eh, dear?"

This argument seemed reasonable to Steve. He could find nothing to say against it. The church being granted, it naturally demanded the accessories of a church wedding. Jessie affirmed it and Steve's own experience proved her assertion. This point gained, it followed that all her old pupils, all her friends and acquaintances, every respectable person she knew must swell the crowd who would gather on the seventh of February, to do her honor.

Nothing could possibly have been more at variance with Steve's desires and opinions. He thought, with grim smiles, of his socialistic conferees, and imagined the words they would say to him. He thought of himself tramping through the Rockies and fiddling and singing to the birds. He thought of himself driving cattle, working before the mast, cutting wheat, rolling barrels, in fact in every antagonistic condition that he had filled. But he could not smile at the contrast, he was too much in love to oppose Jessie's desires in anything, and he told himself that it was the obvious duty of the bridegroom to submit to every whim of the bride,—yet somehow the vision of Hercules with a distaff instead of a club, always slipped into these reminiscences.

The seventh of February brought this condition of enthusiastic devotion to a climax. Steve would have sworn on that morning that all and everything was a too small concession to the satin-robed, bewitching little woman, who laid her hand in his with such a charming confidence. At that moment, neither of them knew, or cared who, or who was not, present. But the outside world noticed that Mrs. Lloyd alone represented Steve's immediate family, and the criticisms on this shabby support, were as various as the people uttering them.

"HIS NAME IS NOT MORRISON," SAID MRS. McASLIN.

"Old Lloyd was afraid he would have to give a big check."

"The girl was a music teacher, and Mrs. Lloyd a Valliante. The Valliantes are a very proud family. I don't suppose the Lloyds have any family to talk of."

"But so few people have."

"We must speak as we know. My own family is very, very old. I wonder at Miss Lloyd's absence. She is said to be so amiable."

"She adored her brother. Girls who adore their brother do not usually adore that brother's wife."

"Do you think so? Now my sister-in-law worships me. She asks my advice about every thing."

"What a phenomenon! You are to be hugely congratulated."

"I heard Miss Lloyd was sick."

"She has chagrin. You know she is engaged—or was engaged—to Lord Medway."

"O! that match is off, I assure you. Here comes the bride! Is she not pretty?"

"Is that Steve Lloyd? Why! how changed he is! The man is positively and audaciously handsome."

"Gentlemanly, too; and I have heard such dreadful reports about him."

"Hush! The service begins."

And what a marvellous service it was! Steve! Mystical, wonderful words gave him the right to take from her father and mother, and brother and sister, a woman he loved, and bind her to his life and soul forever. He was conscious of nothing but this stupendous gift obligation. The words of the official minister beat on his ears and heart as they came from afar off, and with special authority. He was astonished at his own voice, and the slipping of the ring on Jessie's hand was a miracle of grace. Jessie was at last his wife. A delicate destiny led them to a waiting carriage; they entered it with happy words in their ears; they were alone in the travel traffic of the streets; and anon, stepped over the threshold of their home. The world had bid them speed! and left them, and their future happiness was in their own hands.

The suppositions of the company regarding the absence of Mr. Lloyd and Miss Lloyd were as correct as suppositions usually are. Nicholas Lloyd—whose behavior had been lately more and more erratic and contradictory—gave no reason for absenting himself from his son's marriage, except a general disapproval of son's conduct. "Steve will do nothing to please me," he said to Steve's mother, "and therefore he has no right to expect anything from me." Alice's absence was absolutely beyond her control. She prostrated with a nervous headache, which did not suffer her to move, or speak, or endure the light. She said truly enough that if it had been her own wedding service, she could not have been present. The world, however, put its own construction on her absence, and John was a more charitable. He believed that she remained away to prevent meeting under circumstances which would demerit if not familiarity, at least a show of friendliness.

For the admitted relationship of Steve to his sister, which produced precisely the effect John foresaw, Alice did not really say "this is enough for the McAslins," but she felt that she permitted herself to act upon that feeling. She kept out of John's way. If forced to meet him, she drew her sweetest self, and gave him only a polite courtesy which he had no power to refuse, and yet which she felt to be a great cruelty when offered in lieu of those nameless evidences of interest—of affection—which had sweetened his life, and made his days one bright hope.

The injustice of her action was a conscious one. She grieved the wrong, she frequently resolved to atone for it, she wondered why she should make herself and John miserable because she had taken a dislike to Jessie, a perverse spirit ruled whenever an opportunity offered of putting the wrong right. Honestly she had tended to make the marriage ceremony a kind of day of atonement, she had prepared a dress of wonderful beauty to emphasize her submission to events, and in all her kind intentions were frustrated circumstances quite beyond her control.

Her experiences in society during the winter had also greatly embarrassed her attitude towards John McAslin. She had been questioned and twitted and contradicted about the Medway affair, until she felt it would require a great effort to escape the net of circumstances binding her to it. There were days when she did not think she cared to make this effort when her serious appointments and beautiful life, and the glamor of riches and honors were set in such sharp contrast to poverty, and the unlovely straits of life, that to prevent contact with, or even knowledge of the seemed a personal duty. God had set her in pleasant places, why should she go down into the Valley of Baca, to make it a well, or else suffer its miseries and drought? was the almost angry question in her heart.

John divined this struggle in the girl's feelings, for a pure love knows best of the things such that are never told.

In the selection of such as these, the Christian Herald has the valuable assistance of Misses Leitch, who fully know the field of missionary labor, and who have no trouble to collect information needed. Others of the Mission, notably, Dr. Creech, the American Dr. Leonard of the Board, Dr. Chivone Baptist Board, Mr. McLean of the Disciples, Miss S. D. Dore, the Women's Union Society—have all co-operated in the work, and have been able to make up the forty able and sympathetic distributors whose stations we published last week. All these are gladly feeding the grain purchased for them by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

It will be seen by the list now published that all denominations share in this great work. The division of the work is not governed by denominational lines, but by the fact that owing to the character of the work, there was a more pressing need in some cases than in others. The extent of the need was in all cases the principle of distribution.

To supply the need in all cases far exceeds the supply. Bishop Thoburn, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, to whom a remittance of five hundred dollars has been sent, cables: "Famine in India. Eight millions now suffering, a thousand orphans."

More and more pathetic letters from Rev. J. Deane, another Methodist missionary, who writes: "Many mothers are begging us to buy their children. Some are willing to sell them, but not to treat them as we do the children from Africa, and are content to see them with us for money. They say: 'Take my children and I will go off.' One parting was pathetic. It was a mother who left his child with us. He had been a prosperous farmer, but his fields parched and produced nothing. He begged his boy not to go with him for he loved him. Last Friday as I rode home I saw a man lying by the roadside, the cries of the dying ringing in the streets at midnight. You, in your ten thousand miles away, can imagine the strain of heart and mind that this famine causes a missionary. To see our fellow-men in the grip of famine, from the hungry to the dying skeleton, and not being able to help because of the vast numbers, is distressing in the extreme." Margaret Dunning, who describes the fierce appearance of the children, adds: "Two days of regular sufficient food and these wild, wolfish little creatures, their first coming, snatch and tear into cheerful, pleasant little girls. When new comers arrive, 'Let me have plenty; they are so hungry.' What an opportunity there is in these famine times to raise little ones for Christ."

The extent of the famine, with all its appalling horrors, may be estimated by the number of people who toil on the relief works established by the Government. A photograph taken specially for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, of one of these relief camps, is reproduced on the first page. Benjamin Aitken, our own correspondent in the famine districts, who employed the photographer to take the picture for us, writes that this Relief Work is near the historic city of Lucknow. The artist was unable to take a tenth part of the whole scene. In all, there are five thousand persons on the work. In this particular case they are quarrying stone and concrete to be broken into small pieces which will be used for years to come in repairing the roads in and around Lucknow. In the Relief Works in other places, railroads are being made and canals cut for irrigation purposes. These works are not immediately needed, but the Government having undertaken to feed the people, is getting the work done now for the double purpose of finding them employment and of preventing a recurrence of the famines. People of all nationalities in India concur in saying that who know the appalling need and the benefit to the cause of Christ which must come from this distinctively Christian effort to meet it. Dr. James L. Barton, one of the secretaries of the American Board writes: "We sincerely appreciate the excellent work THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is doing for the relief of the sufferers. The letters which come from all parts of our Marathi field report increasing distress and the inability of the government to cope with the famine." Dr. Leonard, of the Methodist Board writes: "Permit me to thank you most heartily for the good work you are doing in aiding our missionaries to provide for the starving people around them." Dr. McLean of the Church of the Disciples writes: "Our workers write us that they are living on week until the crisis is past, and the blessed fruits of the earth are gathered in. The work belongs to the readers of this journal; we are sure that they will carry it forward. It is worthy all the sacrifices of self-denial, and time and trouble they can give; for it means, not only life to those who are starving but an object lesson to those who do not know Christ. When his servants feed them in his name they will learn what Christianity means.

Among the letters from contributors received recently are some which show how true and disinterested these givers are. The following are a few extracts from these letters, which are typical of hundreds of others:

Mrs. F. L. Connell, Topeka, Kan., sends A widow's mite saved by denying ourselves dainties which we used to think were necessities for our table.

G. Ramakee & Son, Greenleaf, Minn.:

It may interest you to know that the $6.30 enclosed as well as the $14 sent last week, was raised by placing a charity box on our counter, on which we pasted a page from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

W. S. Palmer, Sharon, Pa., in sending a contribution of five dollars writes:

I am wonderfully interested in the marvelous philanthropic work being accomplished by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. I firmly believe it is doing the grandest work for humanity in general of any institution in the world. May you have the smile of God's approval, and may he continue to bless your work in the future as he has done in the past.

A TYPICAL VILLAGE IN INDIA.

the Government is doing all in its power to save life, without increasing the burden on the national treasury. In this it presents a striking contrast to the policy of the old native governments, which in former famines permitted the people to die without making any effort to find them employment. Over three million persons are now employed on these Relief Works in various parts of the famine districts, and a large number of the old and sick who are unable to work are being fed in sheds near the relief grounds. But there is universal testimony that, much as the Government is doing, it touches only the fringe of the calamity, and that the aid of the missionaries alone is preventing the deaths rising above the present shocking figures. Many of the people remain in their villages, hoping against hope, living first on one meal a day, then on one meal in two days, and finally without food for days at a time, until they are too weak to undertake the journey to the nearest Government relief camp, which they might have reached if they had started earlier.

The noble work being done by the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is receiving recognition from eminent men, two meals a day and giving the rest to the suffering. I believe THE CHRISTIAN HERALD never did a better work than when it undertook to send relief to these starving people of India." Miss Doremus says: "The Board return many thanks on behalf of our missionaries who are in the centre of the famine district."

More than two months yet remain before any harvest can be expected. In the meantime every week adds to the suffering. It is, we are sure, sufficient to state the fact to ensure continued effort on the part of our readers. They have done so much and have done it so cheerfully that they are not likely to relax their efforts in this supreme crisis. We have had a number of single pages from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD containing a compact story of the famine, struck off which we shall be glad to send to any subscribers who are willing to make an appeal to their churches, Sunday Schools or societies. Much has already been collected in this way, and more might be obtained with a little effort. These pages will help any sympathetic worker in presenting the cause to his friends. It is gratifying to find how many of our friends have not only contributed

MISS AMANDA LONG.
RECORD: 19 YEARS AND 43 WEEKS.

MANY more contestants have been enrolled in the Sunday School competition during the past week. The contest now covers a territory as wide as the Union, and it embraces Sunday Schools belonging to almost every Christian denomination. It is evident that pastors, teachers, superintendents, and scholars are all eagerly watching the issue.

On this page, we give a table showing new entries for the week. The letters, if published in full, would occupy several pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. They are all more or less enthusiastic, and show with what zest and earnestness this unique and friendly rivalry has been taken by our readers and their friends.

J. S. Snedeker, of the 1st Presbyterian Church Sunday School, Hempstead, L. I., comes very close to the front with a record of twenty-one years and twenty-one weeks—unbroken by a single absence. Miss Lottie Carnall, of Trenton, has apparently a clear record of eleven years and seven weeks. John Ford of Hyde Park, Mass., has nine years and thirty-four weeks to his credit. The Baptist Sunday School of Nicetown, Philadelphia, has a remarkable view, Pa., has not missed a Sunday in twenty-two years and four weeks, and the same school has several other excellent records. Miss Pearl Bullock and Jasper Bullock, of Bristol, R. I., have respectively twelve and ten years without an absence. Mr. John Goetz, of New Albany, has been scholar, librarian, teacher and superintendent for twenty years, and Mr. B. F. Faison, of Raleigh, N. C., has sixteen years and thirty-one weeks of consecutive attendances.

Mrs. George Lohr, of Stamford, Conn., may be proud of her children, Charles, Daisy, and Albert, with their records of six years and two months, six years and two months, and five years and two months respectively; Miss Amanda Long, of Humboldt, Kan., according to the testimony of the pastor, has not missed a Sunday School session in nineteen years and forty-three Sabbaths; Ruth Hoadley, of Tunkhannock, Pa., has a twelve years' record fully vouched for; Miss Lulie Shacklister has never missed a Sunday in ten years; Shelton Houston, of Greensboro, N. C., has a record of twelve years and two months, also unbroken; Mr. John Weiland, of Troy, Ohio, has been present for over eleven years and never late—a very good comment, by the way.

For the Honor Prizes there are many entries, the records of five or more years' continuous attendance being surprisingly numerous. Many have seven, eight, or nine years to their credit. Some fine records are marred by occasional absences. All the records mentioned are thoroughly examined, and each contestant will receive the proper marking according to the terms of the competition.

We are pleased to note that the parents of the pupils are also taking an active interest in the contest. All should be careful to have the records vouched for by teacher, pastor, or superintendent before sending them to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Here are some of the letters:

Bath, N. Y. We have some rather notable pupils in the Presbyterian Sunday School at Bath, Steuben county, N. Y. Ada Boileau has missed but two sessions of our Sunday School since December, 1887, fifteen years and eight weeks. And on those two Sundays she was out of town and attended Sunday School where she was, which according to the rules of our school makes her record perfect for the entire fifteen years and eight weeks. E. F. PARKER.

Warren, Ohio. Miss Margaret Isle, a young member of the First Presbyterian Sunday School of Warren, O., who has been in our Sunday School continuously for eleven years (11) missing but two Sundays (unavoidable misses) one on account of death and the other sickness. Now, count out the miss on account of sickness and she would have a record of ten years and two months. She can show a record of nine years and six months without a miss. We have one other who is on her eighth year, also several on their sixth year and a good many on their fifth year, and so down with eighty-seven in our roll of honor for the year 1896, in a school of 600 enrolled. Miss Isle's record has been such as to help many others to be faithful.

Walden, D. W. E. Supt. of Presby. S. S. Mr. Vernon, Ind. The Sunday School of the First Presbyterian Church of Mount Vernon, Ind., has 1000 represented in your contest. Mr.

Julius Shepard began to attend our Sunday School in 1882, and did not miss a session for twelve years and eleven months (12 years, 11 months) 672 consecutive Sundays. During all of this time, except two and a half years, he has been an officer in the school—librarian, secretary, treasurer, and superintendent. The last year he has taught a class of boys. He is an active, enthusiastic worker in the Y. P. S. C. E. of our church and a faithful church member. J. L. GODFREY, Pastor.

Pewee Valley, Ky. Kentucky shows up pretty well in the competition for best record of attendance at Sunday School, but I think I can raise her record still. Carl Engelhardt, now in his nineteenth year, has been a pupil in the Presbyterian Sunday School of Pewee Valley, Ky., for nearly fifteen years, and from 1883 to 1895 inclusive, he was in his seat at the top of the bell for silence every Sunday, except one in 1886, when he was too sick to come. In 1896 he was present fifty Sundays. This makes his record for the thirteen years, 675 attendances. He has two sisters whose records nearly equal his own, Caroline (his twin sister) and Dora.

HENRY M. WOODRUFF, Supt.
A veteran Sunday School Superintendent sends us the following:

Upper Falls, Md. Who is the oldest Sunday School superintendent in the United States? I am over sixty years in service as scholar, superintendent and assistant; had my usual Bible Class on Sunday, February 21, at Salem. H. KENNARD.

This is a good record. We would be pleased to hear from other superintendents on the same subject.

Germantown, Pa. I beg leave to submit to you some of the records of the Sunday School of the Westside Presbyterian Church, Germantown, Pa. Miss Jennie C. Powers entered the school in July, 1875, and has since been present every Sunday up to this present time, a continuous record of twenty-one years and seven months. The following three records are from one class. The continuous attendance is as follows: Charles Berger, 8 years and 4 months; William Elvidge, 7 years and 4 months; Allen Robson, 7 years and 4 months.

In addition to the above would mention: Winnie Harris, 6 years and 4 months; Elsie Hergesheimer, 6 years and 4 months; Martha Weidewelt, 5 years and 4 months; Florie Kreer, 4 years and 4 months; Lizzie Robson, 4 years and 4 months.

In an average attendance of two hundred scholars during the year, twenty-six were present every Sunday, and I could give you in addition to those already mentioned the names of two scholars who have not missed for three years, and five who have not missed for two years.

The following records are highly valued by us, although they are not continuous: Amy Topley has been absent twice in 11 years; Tillie M. Ogden has been absent once in 6 years; Rebecca Barclay has been absent twice in 6 years.

THOMAS F. JONES, Supt.
Cohoes, N. Y. I commenced going to Sunday School at the early age of three years, and am still going, although not a scholar in any class. I am now in my fifty-eighth year, am the librarian in the Sunday School, having held the position just how long I cannot give the precise time, but I date from the time I am sure, commencing in 1890, and have missed only one Sunday in ten years, and in twenty-five years, fifteen Sundays, and in thirty-six years not more than twenty-five Sundays. I am a member of the Reformed Church, Rev. O. H. Watson, pastor.

Kittanning, Pa. This is to certify that Charles Sloop has been in regular attendance on the Sabbath School of the First Presbyterian Church of Kittanning, for twelve years, not missing one Sabbath in all that time. H. L. MAYERS, Pastor. GLO. W. DOVERSPIKE, Superintendent. MRS. R. S. HAYMAKER, Teacher.

Manayunk, Pa. Miss Maggie Cookman Albany, Ebenezer Methodist Episcopal Sunday School, Manayunk, Philadelphia, has never missed a single session since July, 1878, and for ten years attended both morning and afternoon. When the morning school was discontinued, she had attended in all, fourteen hundred and ninety-nine (1499) sessions, up to last Sabbath. We are proud of her record and most cheerfully send her name as a competitor. Fraternally yours in the good work.

WILLIAM H. FORTSMAN, Supt.
MRS. M. BRANKIN, Teacher.

The attendances are to be reckoned as one to each Sunday only. This makes this candidate's record eighteen years and seven months, equal to 664 attendances.

Peoria, Illinois. I have felt very much interested in the Champion Sunday School Contest, wonder to myself if the record of a teacher not be interesting as well. Miss Sallie Ben 700 Franklin street, Peoria, Ill., has attended same First M. E. Sunday School for thirty years last July, only missing four Sundays, all of these she attended Sunday School where in Chicago, making only twice (2) in over thirty years. She is a lady of very delicate health for many weeks, yes, months, she has not dined only from Sunday to Sunday; often times will to dress herself, her mother would do so, her brother almost carry her to the church would go home and to bed again until next day would roll around. I do not know whether teacher's record is desired or not, but I think her faithfulness is beyond my pen.

Mrs. WALTER WYATT
(One of her S. S. S.)
818 Fayette st., Peoria.
We would be pleased to hear from lady's pastor.

Hamilton, N. Y. We have in our Bible at this place a young lady who has not missed a Sunday in her attendance beginning Jan. 1888. Her name is Emily A. Clark.

C. S. SAVAGE, Pastor 1st Baptist Ch.

Rochester, N. Y. A young man, George I. Gow (whose mother, a Scotchwoman, brought Central Presbyterian Sunday School (years old), has never missed a Sunday in years. He is a modest young man, freight, the Erie Railroad depot. Our Sunday Superintendent left us in August, but I probably hear from his teacher or others soon. 466 N. Clinton st. MRS. ELLA R. STEWART.

We have since heard from this date's superintendent, giving the which complies with the conditions of the competition.

Fayetteville, N. Y. Porter T. Smith not missed a session of the Sunday since January 1, 1887, a little more than 10 years. During the past summer our school took during the pastor's absence in August, we have ever had in my recollection, habit had become so fixed that he attend Methodist Sunday School during the month that he has been in attendance at Sunday every Sunday since January 1, 1887.

H. J. KNAPP, Supt. Bapt.
Lititz, Pa. The following persons have missed one session in the given time, and members of the United Evangelical Sunday of Lititz, Pa.: Daniel S. Bowman, 8 years and Young, 11 years; Harry Gingrich, 10 years; Jacob B. Young, 6 years. E. C. R. Supt. of I. D. of U. E. S. S. of Chelsea, Mass. We have in the town of at the Chester Avenue Chapel (a branch of Congregational Church), a young lady who attended Sunday School for eleven years, not missing a session of the school; also, she went to single sessions of the school, not losing any of those schools. On the anniversary, the Superintendent of the Sunday School presented her with a handsome Bible as a testimonial from the school, which attests her faithfulness. She is of every Sunday. Her name is Renfrew. MRS. M. A. HALL.

All records should be sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 100 N. Y. The of for scholars will close June 1st.

After the close of the test for scholars, lists will be opened for teachers and superintendents, and an opportunity will be afforded to the School officers to confer terms of service and of consecutive attendance. Meanwhile the pupils' list still absorbs attention. It would remind our readers of all records, to be accepted, entered on the list, must be fully vouched for by the superintendent, or pastor. Compliance with these conditions qualifies the candidate and makes him or her eligible.

The following are the terms and conditions of the competition:

FIRST PRIZE—ELEGANT LARGE BIBLE (London Edition)—with nearly a thousand superb illustrations, bound in genuine seal. Divinity Circuit, red under solid gold edges, with thumb and appropriately inscribed; Worth $5.00.

SECOND PRIZE—THE SAME BIBLE in Divinity Circuit, Palestine Levant, Leather Binding, Red Under Gold, not indexed, and appropriately inscribed; Worth $4.50.

In addition to the above we shall publish a ROLL OF HONOR PRIZES. For the competition all pupils who have made 260 consecutive attendances and are eligible. Send name, with name of day School and of superintendent or pastor, and the record of continuous attendance. Every successful competitor so vouch will be presented with a superb illustrated New Testament, beautifully bound in Divinity Circuit, with red under gold.

HEROD'S PALACE.*

WITHIN the gaudy and sinful palace which he had builded for himself at the southern outpost of the kingdom, the palace which looked upon the town of Machærus and was overshadowed by the tower of its name,—the Black Fortress,—this stronghold of his power, Herod held high revelry. In that day, one of his sinful house, vice was his pleasure, and his pleasure was naught but this did not, however, offend the beautiful Herodias, who sat on the couch of the king in all the pride of her matured beauty. Time had gone round many times, and he passed from the flagons of the slaves into the reeling brains, and the heated faces of the banqueters. Herod's mirth waxed loud, and the words of his heart escaped by the lips. "With you now, at last, content. O Herod?" he cried suddenly, upon the queen, half in jest, but with drunken wrath. "Hast thou not thy desires?" Art thou not a queen? I not for thy sake divorced a king? Tell me now!" The woman beside him leaned on her arm and she turned in her chair of ivory and gold to look into his eyes. "What I crave?" she asked, in the rich and tender melody which came to her from her grandmother, the beautiful Jewish Princess Mariamme, in her early death. "All that I desire. When hath the tidings come of the death of the daughter of Aretas?" she the messenger, that I may rejoice."

"Would that I might!" replied Herod, "forasmuch as her flight to the father will yet bring down his upon us!"

"Lehem come!" cried the courtiers, with wine and security, "let them be! Is not a dog of Israel better than the beasts of Arabia? Let them come!"

"Atis regarded the gaudy, wine-drunk before him, for a moment, in drunken gravity. "Ay, let them be," he replied; "nevertheless, I tell you, my friends, this woman beside me will yet bring evil upon me and upon you."

"O lord, what sayest thou?" cried the courtiers, turning ghastly under the false moon on her cheek. "What sayest thou art ill, my lord. Come away."

"The king put her rudely aside, and fell in his speech.

"Betill, woman. Ye know, most noble men and men of Jewry, that it is but a few months since, on the day of the kingdom, I was in the city of the earth, the dwelling of the lord of all the world and heir of the name Augustus. Weeks before, in the house of my brother Philip at Jerusalem, I had seen the face of this woman, and had promised her marriage on my return from Rome: not that she had snatched at me, but that she would fain be mine."

"It not true! Antipas, my beloved, is not true! Do I not love thee with—" "May be so," returned the king, nodding his head with the combined vanity of a man and a Herod: "for, how could I be otherwise! But, also, thou art sh for a crown. Yea, and I also love thee, Herodias; nevertheless, I fear thee still. For upon a certain night in Rome, when on a sudden my heart was heavy because of the twain had done my brother, behold, thou camest to me in a vision, and beside stood our father Herod; over his shoulder peeped the dead faces of the kindred slain at his hands, the inmates of the house of the Asmoneans.

thy grandmother Mariamme, thy father Aristobulus, and also his brother and mine, Alexander; and the words of the great king were clear, though his lips moved not in speech: 'Touch not the woman, for in her hand she bringeth vengeance for the death of these; vengeance upon me and all my house!'"

There was a deathful silence upon all the banquet hall: the courtiers looked each into his empty wine-glass, or upon the ground, as he fervently wished himself many miles from the hearing of the words so perilous.

Ere she could speak or move, the king's mood changed swiftly: he burst into loud, broken laughter, and reached up a brawny arm.

"Nay, of a truth, I did but jest," he cried: "or, if not, what matters it? Let us drink and love, for to-morrow we die!"

But the goblet which he lifted never reached his lips: for at that moment a slave entered the banquet hall, with the haste of one who knoweth that his errand will justify his lack of ceremony. And as he bent before Herod, he exclaimed, with a loud voice:—

"Pardon, my lord the king; but certain of the Pharisees are even now come hither from Jerusalem, with tidings that another king hath risen in Judea!"

The goblet rolled crashing upon the marble floor, the wine poured from it and stood in a pool like blood: for the Pharisees, always ready to use the wickedness of another to promote their own ends, had struck their first blow against the kingdom that was not of this world, by sending to Herod the king tidings of the preaching of John the Baptizer, and his proclamation of the king that was to come,—that king who, when they were certain of having found him in the person of Jesus of Nazareth, it would then be time enough to destroy him also.

Philadelphia's Pre-eminence.*

CERTAIN it is that within the last few years we have experienced a revival of intellectual life; and the forces of the city are apparently becoming more united and are being inspired anew. Our commerce has been gradually restored; and though not yet in the supreme condition it was before the War of 1812, it is far in advance of the decay and hopelessness of 1840. Our manufacturing interests, which have always existed in some form, have since the Civil War been inspired with new life and grown to enormous proportions; and the men whom they are raising to wealth and influence will play an important part in the development of the next hundred years. Our architecture is rapidly improving, and there are signs of better ideas in widening and laying out streets and abolishing grade crossings.

Indeed, within the last few years the city has begun to put on a totally different appearance. The people in favor of honest municipal government are becoming more united, more effective in organization, and have already in the last fifteen years accomplished decided reforms. Our college, which was ruined in the Revolution, has been restored by Provost Stille, and within the last ten years raised to a still stronger position by Provost Pepper and Provost Harrison. The manufacturing interests of the city, which were scattered over a wide extent of territory, are being centralized and made more effective by the Bourse. The islands in front of the city have been cut away, the harbor enlarged and deepened, the navigation of the river improved, the wharves extended and connected with the railroad system by the belt line.

The men who are now rising into importance and prominence are educated men, and they will in the future have an educated population to support them. The discussion, of which we hear so much, about a new Philadelphia, has a meaning, and seems to mark a turning-point in municipal history. There are many signs of unity and enlightenment which have been gradually gathering force since the public-school system and the Consolidation Act were adopted; and there is every reason to suppose that they will continue and increase until pre-eminence is restored.

The Consolidation Act has been reinforced in recent years by the Bullitt Bill, as the new city charter is called. After the consolidation of the city, in 1855, some of the old forces of disunion continued to work, and the city government again grew complicated, until there were twenty-five departments more or less independent of each other, and the mayor a mere figure-head with none of the controlling powers of an executive officer. Agitation for a reform began in 1877, and the Bullitt Bill passed in 1885, and went into force in 1887. It reduced the departments to nine, made them report to the mayor, gave them power to investigate their conduct and remove officials. A steady improvement has since been observed in the whole city government.

It required forty or fifty years to overcome and undo the good work of the old colonial rulers, and reduce the city to the decay of 1840; and it has naturally required about the same length of time to restore and renew and bring us to the state we might have reached long ago if the old conditions had gone on in their regular course.

ARMENIAN AID.

DURING the past week, there has been a marked subsidence in the prevailing excitement in Anatolia over the Cretan troubles, although the hope of a renewal of the massacres is not means ended. So excited are the populace at many points, that a little provocation might be productive of a repetition of the terrible scenes of 1895. The relief work continues, and the orphan rescue movement is pressing satisfactorily. During the week another remittance of $2,000 was received from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and sent to Miss Corinna Shattuck, at the work among the orphans. This is the fourth remittance, making a total of $5,000 sent to Oorfa thus far, a grand total of $57,000 since the relief work since the Fund began. A delayed letter from Miss Chambers, associate of Miss Shattuck, just received she writes:

"We have now 107, fifty boys and fifty-seven girls are adding to our numbers as we have able candidates. At first only those wholly orphaned were selected, but now children of widows, where the mother is dead or more children dependent on her for support. We take none from widows less than four, or who are able to help. Miss Shattuck takes the boys into our care, as none of us feel they would have been safe elsewhere. Our girls are in rented houses. They are mothered by Christian widows who are glad of a child who look after them carefully. The attend the village schools all except a few who are not yet old enough to be in school. When out of school they assist in the work of the houses. All who are able to study alone, are sometimes their Sabbath verses by an older sister or sister. Our six largest boys are making shoemaking. The contributions were received during the week:

Medical Missions in Ceylon.

Letters from Mr. and Mrs. Louis Hieb, announced their arrival in Ceylon, where they have made a hopeful beginning in their work. Mr. Hieb went out to be the general Y. M. C. A. secretary in Ceylon, and to engage in aggressive evangelistic, temperance, anti-opium and purity work. Two medical ladies, Drs. Curr and Irwin, have also arrived in Ceylon. They will live with Dr. and Mrs. Scott, while learning, before they formally open the Woman's Medical Mission work at Jaffna, and assume its responsible duties. An effort is being made to raise funds to put the Medical Mission premises in repair.

THE GREAT HEREAFTER.

'TIS sweet to think while struggling
The goal of life to win.
That just beyond the shores of time
The better years begin.

When through the nameless ages
I, longing, cast my eyes,
Before me like a boundless sea,
The great hereafter lies.

Along its brimming bosom
Perpetual summer smiles.
And gathers like a golden robe,
Around the emerald isles.

And in the far blue distance
By lulling breezes fanned,
I seem to see the flowing groves
Of dear old Beulah's land.

And far beyond the islands
That gem the wave serene,
The image of the cloudless shape
Of holy Heaven is seen.

Unto the great hereafter,
Aforetime dim and dark,
I freely now and gladly give
Of life, the wandering bark.

And in the far-off haven,
When shadowy seas are past,
By angel hands the quivering sails
Shall all be furled at last.

THE DEAD PHILOSOPHER.

Prof. Henry Drummond, the Famous Author and Teacher Passed from the Scene of His Labors.

VERY sincere will be the mourning in all parts of Christendom when it is known that the pen that wrote of "Natural Law in the Spiritual World," is laid aside forever; and the voice which fired so many to seek "The Greatest Pain in the World," will speak no more to long, reverent disciples. Henry Drummond is dead. Dead in his prime! when his vigorous mind and clear ringing utterance were most needed. The sad news has been brought to this country on March 11,

THE LATE PROF. DRUMMOND.

Thousands of hearts realized that the world was poorer than it had been. Prof. Drummond had the faculty of making friends wherever he went and of winning affection and esteem of men who would not accept his doctrines. He had strong, manly lucidity of manner and clearness which impressed his hearers and made as the characteristic of a man who thought clearly, and was able to express himself in clear, unambiguous phraseology. A man who believed strongly in truth and was ready to follow wherever truth led, and to accept the consequences of his reasoning. People have said that Prof. Drummond traveled far between the time he was writing "Natural Law," and his recently published book on "The Programme of Christianity." A friend of the distinguished author told him that this was said, when he laughingly declared that "The Programme of Christianity" was written long before "Natural Law," though it was not published until lately. Henry Drummond was born in 1851, at Perth, Scotland. He was educated in his native town, and went thence to the University of Edinburgh and the Free Church Divinity School. Subsequently he took a course at the University of Göttingen, Germany, where he was honored with the degree of Ph.D. At the age of twenty-six, he was appointed Lecturer in Science at the University of Glasgow, and shortly afterward became professor in the same institution. It is an interesting fact that the book which made his name familiar throughout Christendom and which was destined to have a larger sale than almost any theological work of the period, was rejected by every publisher to whom the young author offered it. Finally, despairing of getting it into print, he left the manuscript with a friend

No Plant that Cures Asthma. - Free.
The new African Kola plant is Nature's botanic cure of Asthma in every form. Mr. A. C. Lewis, who writes for the Farmer's Magazine, writes that it cured him when he could not lie down at night for asthma choking. Rev. J. L. Coombs, of Martinsburg, Va., testifies to his entire cure after years' suffering, and many others give similar testimony. His cures are really wonderful. If you are a sufferer, we advise you to send to the Kola Exporting Co., 1164 Broadway, New York, to send you a large case by mail free, to receive a power. It costs you nothing, and you will surely try it.

and went on an exploring tour in Central Africa. His friend was more successful than he and it was published. One day when Drummond had reached the northern shore of Lake Nyassa, having been for five months without news from home, a package of letters reached him, informing him of the astonishing success of his book. It passed rapidly through many editions in English, had an enormous sale in this country, and was translated into French, German, Dutch and Norwegian. Among other works from his pen which were widely read, were "The Greatest Thing in the World," "Tropical Africa," "The Programme of Christianity," and "The Ascent of Man." Prof. Drummond's earnest endeavor was to reconcile Christianity and Science, and to show especially to young men that there was no way of mental growth and development so sure as to make the Bible the guide of their lives.

IMMORTALITY.

"It is better further on." - Phillips Brooks.
AS years go by and words seem less,
Faith, Hope and Love are more to me;
Sweet Hope, that through the mystic veil,
With clearer vision God can see.
All earthly things more shadowy grow,
Still passing with the years away.
The Eternal and Invisible
Brighten as nears the heavenly day -
"It is better further on."
Hope, 'mid the wreckage sad of life
Hears, like a songbird, 'mid the gloom:
"All things shall work for good to those Who to the Lord in love have come."
The Love that counts all human life
In one great brotherhood the same,
The Heavenly Father's children all,
Bearing the signet of his name -
"It is better further on."
I'm rising still, I feel, I know,
To nobler life beyond the sky;
Earth's sunrise gold is on my head,
But heaven's pure light is by-and-by.
The nearer I approach the end,
Immortal symphonies I hear
From world unseen, with notes of joy,
Onward and upward, calling clear,
"It is better further on."
I stand upon the opening way
Unknown, that stretches on before,
Praying that still each onward step
Fast hold shall take on shining shore.
The earthly life is dear and sweet,
With all its precious blessings given
By Hand of Love, that still has kept
The best for his redeemed in heaven.
"It is better further on."

A Prominent Physician Writes:

SPOTSWOOD, N. J., May 12th, 1896
Messrs. McKesson & Robbins:
Dear Sirs--Mr. _____ called on me a few days ago and left with me a sample bottle of Tartaralithine tablets, which I gave to an obstinate case of chronic rheumatism. As soon as they were used the patient sent to my office, asking for more of the same medicine, stating that it had acted splendidly. The same patient has taken every preparation and combination conceivable, but this was his last, and this his request and statement. I would like a couple of bottles of tablets for this patient and another in similar trouble.
Yours very truly,

AN AFTERNOON TEA OF THE MOTHERS' CLUB AT WHITTIER HOUSE, JERSEY CITY, N. J. (See Page 100.)

A HAVEN OF HELPFULNESS.

What the Workers of Whittier House Social Settlement are Doing in Jersey City, N. J., to Brighten Lowly Lives.

SHORT time ago two boys were running as hard as they could go along Grand street, Jersey City, N. J. They stopped at a plain substantial house and eagerly inquired for Miss Bradford.

They had seen a rough man beating a woman a few blocks away and they were afraid he would kill her. By no means a formidable looking person is the lady to whom the boys carried their appeal for help in the emergency. But there must have been some reason why, seeing a disturbance in the street they called to her, instead of to the police. The lady who went with the boys and rescued the woman from her drunken, brutal husband, is well known enough that neighborhood and many miles around. Among the homes of working-people, the resorts of news-boys, and in the factories, her cheerful, kindly, intelligent face is well known to all. In any case of trouble, in any misfortune, in trials personal or domestic, whether there is sickness, bereavement, or a financial crisis, or some gross injustice that needs to be rectified, the impulse of the boys to call her to the rescue of the woman is the impulse of the poor people. "Send to Miss Bradford," ask Miss Bradford about it," is the most invariable suggestion. If this wonderful lady kept a diary recording the emergencies in which her assistance is sought and the problems submitted to her for solution, it would show a variety of human trouble that would amaze the reader. She is popularly supposed to know everything, and to be the incarnation of sound, practical common-sense, and helpfulness. "You seem to be a general women's friend," said a city official the other day after the energetic lady had paid him a series of visits during the previous weeks, each visit as the advocate of some poor woman of the neighborhood who needed official interposition either as an oppressive landlord, or protection in some form or other against wrong.

To persons familiar with the work of degree and social settlements in great cities, the position Miss Bradford occupies as adviser-general and "everybody's friend," is no mystery. Wherever the experiment of a settlement has been tried, it has been found that a disinterested effort to render service to those who need it has been cordially welcomed and heartily appreciated. Miss Bradford commenced her emergency may have their lives brightened and the inevitable ills of their lot alleviated, by the residence among them of some follower of Christ, who was anxious to be useful in any way that opened. The possession of wealth was not essential, nor need the worker be a very learned or accomplished person. The one thing indispensable was the love to all and the spirit of self-sacrifice that the religion of Christ inspires. Assured of this, Miss Bradford settled in Jersey City about four years ago. She spent about five months in getting thoroughly acquainted with the people to whom she proposed to devote her life.

Dr. Scudder, in hearty sympathy with any kindly beneficent project, placed an unoccupied room in his People's Palace at her disposal, which became her temporary headquarters. For some time Miss Bradford spent her days in visiting among the tenements and humble homes that clustered around Dr. Scudder's church. She listened to stories of sorrow, privation and hardship, and studied the problems of the people's lives with a sincere desire to discover and apply a remedy, if one could be found. For one man she managed to secure employment; for another she negotiated a chattel mortgage at six per cent.; for another she faced an obdurate landlord and induced him to make his house decently clean and habitable. There was ment. "It was some time," Miss Bradford says, "before the women could believe that there was no hidden reason for these teas. Finally one woman frankly said: 'Miss Bradford, we don't know what to think about these meetings. You don't ask us to go to church, to sign a pledge, or to pray with you. You seem to forget that we are used to washin', scrubbin', and such works. You seem only to try to make us happy.' Now, what do you want of us any way?" When I told her that my desire was to give them one afternoon a week when life might seem to them pleasant and comfortable, the tired face brightened, and she replied: 'Well, life ain't so bad after all when you have a friend who cares whether you live or die.' It is now our custom at these teas to give lectures and talks to the mothers on home improvement and kindred topics. By this time we were an incorporated Settlement, and through the kindness and generosity of one of our officers we were enabled to secure our present building. The house is a large, handsome three-story brick residence, in every way admirably adapted to the needs of the settlement. We are not, by any means, in the very lowest part of the city.

It was found convenient to organize clubs for the entertainment of the different kinds of visitors at the new Settlement. One of the first was composed at the outset of fifteen little girls who had been accustomed to play on the streets until nine or ten o'clock in the evening. Miss Bradford and her helpers began by reading to them one of Louise Alcott's books. They listened gladly, became deeply interested, and came night after night. Reading and games were the occupations, and the club was organized under the name of the Louise Alcott Club. A Mothers' Club was arranged soon afterward, and a Newsboys' Club followed. Then a Men's Club, and others as the need arose. In each case the time was passed pleasantly in reading, or talks on subjects of interest to the members. Besides these, educational classes were organized for teaching millinery and dress making, Latin, stenography, singing, music, cooking, etc., the members paying a small fee for the teacher and appliances. gether, Whittier House speedily became a very busy place, where the people were very happy, and where they knew that they were always sure of sympathy in trouble, and kindly service if it could be rendered. It became just such an institution as the tender, brotherly poet would have loved to see associated with his name. Miss Bradford knew him well, and has taken a pleasure in putting his portrait in every room. For the motto of the institution she has taken the poet's well-known lines:

He serves thee best who loveth most
His brothers and thy own.

Miss Bradford and her helpers are thoroughly happy in their work and are rejoiced at the success which has attended it. The cost of it hitherto has not been more than twenty-five hundred dollars a year, but the happiness it has brought into the dull and burdened lives of the people of that neighborhood is beyond estimate. The expenses are paid by voluntary contributions and there is occasionally a straitness of resources, but hitherto funds sufficient to meet the emergency have always been supplied by sympathetic friends when they were needed.

How One Pastor Helped India.

Rev. R. G. Hobbs, of Illinois, who Aroused the Sympathies of the Farmers in the Corn Belt.

ONE of the foremost preachers of the M. E. Church in Illinois is Rev. R. G. Hobbs, who is now pastor of the Centenary Church in Jacksonville, Ill. Hobbs is exceedingly popular in his district, and his church has one of the largest congregations in the Conference, the membership being over seven hundred, while the regular Sunday attendance is seldom less than a thousand. It is a church full of spiritual life and energy, and its people are active in Christian work and varied benevolences. The pastor has lately directed the attention of his people toward suffering India, and the spirit of helpfulness has spread throughout the great corn belt of Central Illinois, awakening a generous sympathy everywhere. Many offers of contributions of corn for India were received by the pastor and were accepted, his purpose being to arrange ultimately to send the gifts in a vessel, provided one could be secured for the purpose.

Dr. Hobbs, who is now visiting New York, speaks modestly of his own efforts in the relief work. He says:

"Some months ago my attention was arrested by the first reports of the famine in India. I live in Central Illinois—about where the buckle comes together in the great corn belt. Instantly I thought of the overflowing cribs of the corn country—with more grain in them than Joseph ever stored up in the years of plenty. Why not get those cribs opened on the sides toward India? I made the suggestion to the Missionary Committee of the Methodist Church, and the idea was heartily endorsed. Then it was thought best to convert the grain into money, because it could be sent so much more quickly. We had not yet begun to realize what a wide-reaching famine it was to be. It was thought a few thousand dollars would be enough to send. When the magnitude of the calamity became apparent, the plan of sending corn again came to the front. I have felt from the beginning that this should be done. It takes a little longer to send relief in this way, but the money goes further and carries more help, and help will be as much needed a little later as it is to-day. I had a letter from a personal friend, a missionary, who is five hundred miles northeast of Bombay. The letter bears the date of January 10. My friend says he is in the heart of a great famine district, that hundreds have starved to death on his circuit; that the famine must last the greater part of a year yet.

"There is another thing not to be forgotten. Corn is worth not more than ten cents per bushel in some parts of the West. This giving will afford an outlet for part of the surplus. What remains will be the more valuable for this giving. Surely it was not without design that the crops of the last three years were so abundant! Western farmers may, by this sending of corn to the Orient, open a new market for their grain. This is perhaps a selfish way to look at the matter. The benevolent enterprise may be thus a direct advantage to our own people."

Dr. Hobbs was born in Joliet, Ill., in 1854. His father is a Methodist pastor, an honored member of the Nebraska Conference. He entered Northwestern University at the age of thirteen, registering a few weeks later as a student for the ministry. It is doubtful if anyone is likely ever to register at the Garrett Biblical Institute, the theological department of the University, at an earlier age. He graduated from the full college and theological course, and was admitted to the Illinois Conference—the strongest conference in Methodism west of the Alleghenies—in 1874, having been given a license to preach at sixteen. He has been continuously a pastor ever since.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S SOCIAL.

plenty of work to do of this kind, and Miss Bradford soon had her days full of business.

Dr. Scudder and the officers of the People's Palace facilitated Miss Bradford in her next step, which was to have a weekly afternoon tea for mothers. These teas were held in the gymnasium, and soon became a popular entertainment in the neighborhood. They were informal affairs, with no attempt at preaching or teaching, but simply friendly social enjoyment. She was familiar with the settlement idea and had seen it in operation at the Hull House in Chicago, and Mansfield House and Toynbee Hall in London. She had seen how workingmen and their wives and children, who do not need charity, save in some exceptional

SYMPATHY FOR THE GREEKS.

A Sermon by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., } I am debtor both to the Greeks on the Text: Rom. 1:14: - - - } and the barbarians.

AT this time, when that behemoth of abominations, Mohammedanism, after having gorged itself on the carcasses of a hundred thousand Armenians, is trying to put its paws upon one of the fairest of all nations, that of the Greeks, I preach this sermon of sympathy and protest, for every intelligent person on this side of the sea, as well as the other side, like Paul who wrote the text, is debtor to the Greeks. The present crisis is emphasized by the guns of the allied powers of Europe, ready to be unlimbered against the Hellenes, and I am asked to speak out. Paul, with a master intellect of the ages, sat in brilliant Corinth, the great AcroCorinthus fortress frowning from the height of sixteen hundred and eighty-six feet, and in the house of Gaius, where he was a guest, a big pile of money near him, which he was taking to Jerusalem for the poor. In this Letter to the Romans, which Chrysostom admired so much that he had it read to him twice a week, Paul practically says: "I, the Apostle, am bankrupt. I owe what I cannot pay, but I will pay as large a percentage as I can. It is an obligation for what Greek literature and Greek sculpture and Greek architecture and Greek prowess have done for me. I will pay all I can in installments of evangelism. I am insolvent to the Greeks." Hellas, as the inhabitants call it, or Greece, as we call it, is insignificant in size, about a third as large as the State of New York, but what it lacks in breadth it makes up in height, with its mountains Cylene, and Eta, and Taygetus, and Tymphrestus, each over seven thousand feet in elevation, and its Parnassus, over eight thousand. Just the country for mighty men to be born in, for in all lands the most of the intellectual and moral giants were not born on the plain, but had for cradle the valley between two mountains. That country, no part of which is more than forty miles from the sea, has made its impress upon the world as no other nation, and it to-day holds a first mortgage of obligation upon all civilized people. While we must leave to statesmanship and diplomacy the settlement of the intricate questions which now involve all Europe, and indirectly all nations, it is time for all churches, all schools, all universities, all arts, all literatures to sound out in the most emphatic way the declaration, "I am debtor to the Greeks."

In the first place, we owe to their language our New Testament. All of it was first written in Greek, except the Book of Matthew, and that, written in the Aramaean language, was soon put into Greek by our Saviour's brother, James. To the Greek language we owe the best sermon ever preached, the best letters ever written, the best visions ever kindled. All the parables in Greek. All the miracles in Greek. The sermon on the mount in Greek. The story of Bethlehem and Golgotha and Olivet and Jordan banks and Galilean beaches and Pauline embarkation and Pentecostal tongues and seven trumpets that sounded over Patmos, have come to the world in liquid, symmetric, picturesque, philosophic, unrivalled Greek, instead of the gibberish language in which many of the nations of the earth at that time jumbled. Who can forget it and who can exaggerate its thrilling importance, that Christ and heaven were introduced to us in the language of the Greeks? the language in which Homer had sung and Sophocles dramatized and Plato dialogued and Socrates discoursed and Lysurgus legislated and Demosthenes thundered his oration on "The Crown?" Everlasting thanks to God that the waters of life were not handed to the world in the unwashed cup of corrupt languages from which nations had been drinking, but in the clean, bright, golden-lipped, emerald-handled chalice of the Hellenes. Learned Curtius wrote a whole volume about the Greek verb. Philologists century after century have been measuring the symmetry of that language, laden with elegy and philippic, drama and comedy, Odyssey and Iliad; but the grandest thing that Greek language ever accomplished was to give to the world the benediction, the comfort, the irradiation, the salvation of the Gospel of the Son of God. For that we are debtors to the Greeks.

And while speaking of our philological obligation, let me call your attention to the fact that many of the intellectual and moral and theological leaders of the ages got much of their discipline and effectiveness from Greek literature. It is popular to scoff at the dead languages, but fifty per cent. of the world's intellectuality would have been taken off if, through learned institutions our young men had not, under competent professors, been drilled in Greek masterpieces. Hesiod's "Weeks and Days," or the eulogium by Simonides of the slain in war, or Pindar's "Odes of Victory," or "The Recollections of Socrates," or "The Art of Words," by Corax, or Xenophon's Anabasis.

From the Greeks the world learned how to make history. Had there been no Herodotus and Thucydides, there would have been no Macaulay or Bancroft. Had there been no Sophocles in tragedy, there would have been no Shakespeare. Had there been no Homer, there would have been no Milton. The modern wits, who are now or have been out on the divine mission of making the world laugh at the right time, can be traced back to Aristophanes, the Athenian, and many of the jocosities that are now taken as new had their suggestions twenty-three hundred years ago in the fifty-four comedies of that master of merriment. Grecian mythology has been the richest mine from which orators and essayists have drawn their illustrations and painters the themes for their canvas, and although now an exhausted mine, Grecian mythology has done a work that nothing else could have accomplished: Boreas, representing the north wind; Sisyphus, rolling the stone up the hill, only to have the same thing to do over again; Tantalus, with fruits above him that he could not reach; Achilles, with his arrows; Icarus, with his waxen wings, flying too near the sun; the Centaurs, half man and half beast; Orpheus, with his lyre; Atlas, with the world on his back, all these and more have helped literature, from the graduate's speech on commencement day to Rufus Choate's eulogium on Daniel Webster at Dartmouth. Tragedy and comedy were born in the festivals of Dionysius at Athens. The lyric and elegiac and epic poetry of Greece five hundred years before Christ has its echoes in the Tennysons, Longfellow, and Bryants of eighteen and nineteen hundred years after Christ. There is not an effective pulpit or editorial chair or professor's room or cultured parlor or intelligent farmhouse to-day in America or Europe that could not appropriately employ Paul's ejaculation and say, "I am debtor to the Greeks."

The fact is this, Paul had got much of his oratorical power of expression from the Greeks. That he had studied their literature was evident, when standing in the presence of an audience of Greek scholars on Mars' Hill, which overlooks Athens, he dared to quote from one of their own Greek poets, either Cleanthus or Aratus, declaring, "As certain also of your own poets have said, 'for we are also his offspring.'" And he made accurate quotation, Cleanthus, one of the poets, having written:

For we thine offspring are. All things that creep
Are but the echo of the voice divine.

And Aratus, one of their own poets, wrote:

Doth care perplex? Is lowering danger nigh?
We are his offspring, and to Jove we fly.

It was rather a risky thing for Paul to attempt to quote extemporaneously from a poem in a language foreign to his, and before Greek scholars, but Paul did it without stammering, and then acknowledged before the most distinguished audience on the planet his indebtedness to the Greeks, crying out in his oration, "As one of your own poets has said."

Furthermore, all the civilized world, like Paul, is indebted to the Greeks for architecture. The world before the time of the Greeks had built monoliths, obelisks, cromlechs, sphinxes, and pyramids, but they were mostly monumental to the dead whom they failed to memorialize. We are not certain even of the names of those in whose commemoration the pyramids were built. But Greek architecture did most for the living. Ignoring Egyptian precedents, and borrowing nothing from other nations, Greek architecture carved its own columns, set its own pediments, adjusted its own entablatures, rounded its own mouldings, and carried out as never before the three qualities of right-building, called by an old author "firmitas, utilitas, venustas," namely, firmness, usefulness, beauty. Although the Parthenon on the Acropolis of Athens is only a wreck of the storms and earthquakes and bombardments of many centuries, and although Lord Elgin took from one side of that building, at an expense of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, two shiploads of sculpture, one shipload going down in the Mediterranean and the other shipload now to be found in the British Museum, the Parthenon, though in comparative ruins, has been an inspiration to all architects for centuries past, and will be an inspiration all the time from now until the world itself is a temple ruin. Oh, that Parthenon! One never gets over having once seen it. But what must it have been when it stood as its architects, Iktinos and Kallikrates, built it out of Pentelican marble, white as Mont Blanc at noonday, and as overwhelming. Height above height. Over-topping the august and majestic pile, and rising from its roof, was a statue of Pallas Promachus in bronze, so tall and flashing that sailors far out at sea beheld the plume of her helmet. Without the aid of the Eternal God it never could have been planned, and without the aid of God the chisels and trowels never could have constructed it. There is not a fine church building in all the world, or a properly-constructed courthouse, or a beautiful art gallery, or an appropriate auditorium, or a tasteful home, which, because of that Parthenon, whether its style or some other style be adopted, is not directly or indirectly a debtor to the Greeks.

But there is another art in my mind,—the most fascinating, elevating, and inspiring of all arts, and the nearest to divine,—for which all the world owes a debt to the Hellenes that will never be paid. I mean sculpture. At least a hundred and fifty years before Christ the Greeks perpetuated the human face in terra cotta and marble. What a blessing to the human family that men and women, mightily useful, who could live only within a century may be perpetuated for five or six or ten centuries. He who wishes that some sculptor, contemporaneous with Christ, could have put his matchless form in marble! But for every grand, exquisite statue of Martin Luther, of John Knox, of William Penn, of Thomas C. Miers, of Wellington, of Lafayette, of some of the great statesmen or emancipators or conquerors who adorn your parks or the niches of your academies, you are debtors to the Greeks. They covered the Acropolis, they glorified the temples, they adorned the cemeteries with statues, some in cedar, some in ivory, some in silver, some in gold, some in size diminutive, some in size colossal. Thanks to Phidias who worked in stone; to Clearchus, who worked in bronze; to Dantas, who worked in gold, and to all ancient chisels of commemoration! Do you not realize that many of the wonders of sculpture we owe to the Greeks?

Yea! For the science of medicine, a great art of healing, we must thank the Greeks. There is the immortal Greek doctor, Hippocrates, who first opened a door for disease to go out and health to come in. He first set forth the importance of cleanliness and sleep, making the patient before treatment to be washed and to slumber on the hide of a sacrificed bee. He first discovered the importance of thorough prognosis and diagnosis. He formulated the famous oath of Hippocrates which is taken by physicians of this day. He emancipated medicine from superstition, empiricism, and priestcraft. He was the father of all the infirmaries, hospitals, and medical colleges of the twenty-three centuries. Ancient medicine and surgery had before that been an anatomical and physiological assault, a battery, and long after the time of Hippocrates the Greek doctor, where his theories were not known, the Bible speaks of a fatal medical treatment, when it says: "his disease he sought not to the Lord, but to the physicians, and Asa slept with his fathers." And we read in the New Testament of the poor woman who had been treated by incompetent doctors who asked large fees, where it says: "She had suffered many things of many physicians and had spent all that she had, and nothing better, but rather grew worse. For our glorious science of medicine and surgery, more sublime than astronomy, we have more to do with disease than with the stars; more beautiful than botany, a bloom of health in the cheek of wife and child is worth more to us than all the roses of the garden—for this grandest of all sciences, the science of healing, every pill of recovered invalid, every ward of American and European hospital may well shout, "Thank God for old doctor Hippocrates! I, like Paul, am indebted to the Greeks."

Furthermore, all the world is obligated to Hellas more than it can ever pay for heroisms in the cause of liberty and right. United Europe to-day had not better think that the Greeks will not fight. There may be fallings back and vacillations and temporary defeat, but if Greece is right, Europe cannot put her down. The other nations, before they open the port-holes of their men-of-war against that small kingdom had better read of the battle of Marathon, where ten thousand Athenians, led on by Miltiades, triumphed over one hundred thousand of their enemies. At that time in Greek council of war five generals were for beginning the battle and five were against it. Callimachus, presided at the council of war, had the deciding vote, and Miltiades addressed him, saying:

to enslave Athens, or by insuring freedom, to win yourself an immortal fame, for never since the Athenians were people were they in such danger as they are in at this moment. If they bow to the Medes, they are to be reaped to Hippias, and you know what will then have to suffer; but if they come victorious out of this contest, she has it in her power to become the city of Greece. Your vote is to decide whether we are to join battle or not. We do not bring on a battle presently, but a factious intrigue will disunite the Athenians and the city will be betrayed to the Medes, but if we fight before there is any rot in the state of Athens, I think that, provided the gods will give us aid and no favor, we are able to get the best of it in the engagement."

At the vote of Callimachus, and the battle opened, and in full run the Miltiades fell upon the Persian shouting, "On! Sons of Greece! for the freedom of your country! for the freedom of your children, for our wives, for the shrines of your gods, and for the sepulchres of our fathers! All, all are now staked on the issue!" While only one hundred and two Greeks fell, six thousand four hundred Persians lay dead upon the field, many of the Asiatic hosts who took to the war vessels in the harbor were crowded in the shipping. Persian oppression was rebuked, Grecian liberty was secured, the cause of civilization was advanced, and the Western world and all nations felt the heroics. Had there been no Miltiades, there might have been no Washington.

At Thermopylae, three hundred Greeks, along a road so wide enough for a wheelbarrow, between a mountain and a marsh, died rather than surrender. Had there been no Thermopylae, there might have been no Bunker Hill. The echo of the Athenian and Spartan heroics was heard at the gates of Moscow, and Sebastopol, and Vicksburg, and Lexington, and Gettysburg, English Magna Carta, and Declaration of American Independence, and the story of Robert Burns, entitled, "Man for a Man for a That," are only the long-continued repetition of what was said and done twenty centuries before in that little kingdom that the powers of Europe are now imposing upon Greece having again and again shown that ten men in the right are stronger than a hundred men in the wrong, the heroics of Leonidas and Aristides and Thermopylae will not cease their mission until the last man on earth is as free as God made him. There is not on either side of the Atlantic to-day, a republic that cannot truthfully employ the words of the text and say, "I am debtor to the Greeks."

It now comes the practical question. How can we pay that debt, or a part of it? For we cannot pay more than ten percent of that debt in which Paul acknowledged himself a bankrupt. By calling Almighty God that he will help Greece in its present war with Mohammedanism and the concerted empires of Europe. I know her queen, a noble, Christian woman, her face the throne of beneficence and loveliness, her life an example of noble wifehood and motherhood. God help those palaces in these days of awful exigency! Our American Senate did well the other day, when, in the Capitol building which owes to Greece its columnar impressiveness, they passed a hearty resolution of sympathy for that nation. Would that all who have heard words that can be heard in Europe would utter them now, when they are so much needed! Let us repeat to them in English what they centuries ago declared in Greek: "Blessed are those who are persecuted for righteousness' sake, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven."

Another way of partly paying our debt to the Greeks is by higher appreciation of the learning and self-sacrifice of the men who in our own land stand for all that the ancient Greeks stood. While here and there one comes to public approval and reward, the most of them live in privation or on salary disgracefully small. The scholars, the archeologists, the artists, the literati—most of them live up three or four nights of stairs and by small windows that do not let in the full sunlight. You pass them every day in your streets without any recognition. Grub street, where many of the mighty men of the past suffered, is long enough to reach around the world. No need of wasting our sympathy upon the unappreciated thinkers and workers of the past! Though Linnæus sold his works for a single ducat. Though Noah Webster's Spelling Book yielded him more than his Dictionary. Though Correggio, the great painter, receiving for long continued work payment of thirty-nine dollars, died from over-joy. Though when Golosmith's friends visited him they were obliged to sit in the window, as he had but one chair. Though Samuel Boyse, the great poet, starved to death. Though the author of "Hudibras," died in a garret. Though "Paradise Lost" brought its author only twenty-five dollars cash down, with promise of fifty dollars more if the sale warranted

Oh, tell them how Christ has helped you all the way through. They are in bewilderment. Oh, tell them with how many hands of joy heaven beckons you upward. "When Greek meets Greek, then comes the tug of war," but when a warm-hearted Christian meets a man who needs pardon and sympathy and comfort and eternal life, then comes victory. If you can, by some incident of self-sacrifice, bring to such scholarly men and women what Christ has done for their eternal rescue, you may bring them in. Where Homos-thenic eloquence and Homeric imagery would fail, a kindly heart-throb may succeed. A gentleman of this city sends me the statement of what occurred a few days ago among the mines of British Columbia. It seems that Frank Conson and Jim Smith were down in the narrow shaft of a mine. They had loaded an iron bucket with coal, and Jim Hemsworth, standing above ground, was hauling the bucket up by windlass, when the windlass broke and the loaded bucket was descending upon the two miners. Then Jim Hemsworth, seeing what must be certain death to the miners beneath, threw himself against the cogs of the whirling windlass, and though his flesh was torn and his bones were broken, he stopped the whirling windlass and arrested the descending bucket, and saved the lives of the two miners beneath. The superintendent of the mine flew to the rescue and blocked the machinery. When Jim Hemsworth's at: but now commandeth all men everywhere to repent: because he hath appointed a day in the which he will judge the world in righteousness, by that man whom he hath ordained: whereof he hath given assurance unto all men, in that he hath raised him from the dead." By the time he has got through the translation from the Greek I think you will see his lip tremble and there will come a pallor on his face like the pallor on the sky at daybreak. By the eternal salvation of that scholar, that great thinker, that splendid man you will have done something to help pay your indebtedness to the Greeks. And now to God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost, be honor and glory, and dominion and victory and song world without end. Amen.

PUBLIC BATH-HOUSES.

New York Improving its Present System, and Erecting Beautiful Public Comfort Buildings.

In all the great cities of the world the public bath is a prominent institution. London, Paris, Vienna, Berlin and Rome have many spacious and magnificent buildings devoted to that purpose, all constructed on modern principles and with a view to the best architectural and utilitarian results. Birmingham, Brighton, Newington, Newport, and other localities in England have, in recent years, erected capacious buildings for purposes of public comfort. Of late years, New York, which is sadly deficient in this respect, has devoted attention to the matter and an official Committee was appointed in 1895 to investigate and report. That Committee collected all the material available on the subject, and the result of its labors and recommendations is that the metropolis will soon have some very beautiful and useful buildings, open the year 'round, and of great value as aids to public health and comfort.

Chief among these will be a system of improved bath-houses which will be introduced. New York had the first public bath in the United States where the spray or rain-bath system was used for hot or cold water. Since 1891, the People's Baths (a system under which a nominal charge is made), furnished over 420,000 baths. This effectually demonstrated that the public bath was clearly a municipal function, and should not be controlled by private persons. The city authorities, therefore, had plans and specifications prepared for an experimental Public Bath-house to be located in Tompkins Square (the building is shown in the illustration on this page, photographed from the architect's drawings). It will contain waiting-rooms for men and boys with seats for 100 persons, and one for women with seats for fifty. In the men's department there will be twenty-eight rain-baths on the main floor, and fourteen on the second, ten tub-baths for men and seventeen rain-baths for boys—sixty-nine in all. For women there will be seventeen rain-baths on the main floor, and ten tubs on second floor—twenty-seven baths in all. It is estimated that these accommodations will be equal to supplying over one million baths a year. There will also be the necessary laundry conveniences for washing towels, engineering for heating and supplying electric light and for ventilation. All the baths will have dressing-rooms (except those with bath-tubs), and each floor will have a marble foot-bath. All will be arranged with a view to the best hygienic results. The departments for the sexes are entirely separate.

This beautiful building is to be in the Italian style of architecture, simple yet dignified, and the material will be light stone. It will be in the centre of the east side of Tompkins Square, immediately adjoining Avenue B, and will be one of the most ornamental and useful public structures in the metropolis.

THE PROPOSED NEW PUBLIC BATH IN TOMPKINS SQUARE, NEW YORK.

it: so that seventy-five dollars was all that was paid for what is considered the greatest poem ever written. Better turn our attention to the fact that there are at this moment hundreds of authors, painters, sculptors, architects, brain-workers without bread and without fuel and without competent apparel. As far as you can afford it, buy their sculpture, read their books, purchase their pictures, encourage their pen, their pencil, their chisel, their engraver's knife, their architect's compass. The world calls them "bookworms" or "Dr. Dry-as-Dust," but if there had been no bookworms or dry doctors of law and science and theology, there would have been no Apocalyptic angel. They are the Greeks of our country and time, and your obligation to them is infinite.

But there is a better way to pay them, and that is by their personal salvation, which will never come to them through books or through learned presentation, because in literature and intellectual realms they are masters. They can out-argue, out-quote, out-dogmatize you. Not through the gate of the head, but through the gate of the heart, you may capture them. When men of learning and might are brought to God they are brought by simplest story of what religion can do for a soul. They have lost children. Oh, tell them how Christ comforted you when you lost your bright boy or blue-eyed girl. They have found life a struggle.

bleeding and broken body was put on a litter and carried homeward, and some one exclaimed: "Jim, this is awful!" he replied: "Oh, what's the difference so long as I saved the boys!" What an illustration it was of suffering for others, and what a text from which to illustrate the behavior of our Christ, limping and lacerated and broken and torn and crushed in the work of stopping the descending ruin that would have destroyed our souls! Try such a scene of vicarious suffering as this on that man capable of overthrowing all your arguments for the truth, and he will sit down and weep. Draw your illustrations from the classics, and it is to him an old story, but Leyden jars and electric batteries and telescopes and Greek drama will all surrender to the story of Jim Hemsworth's, "Oh, what's the difference so long as I saved the boys?"

Then if your illustration of Christ's self-sacrifice, drawn from some scene of today, and your story of what Christ has done for you does not quite fetch him into the right way, just say to him, "Professor—Doctor—Judge! Why was it that Paul declared he was a debtor to the Greeks?" And ask your learned friend to take his Greek Testament and translate for you, in his own way, from Greek into English, the splendid peroration of Paul's sermon on Mars Hill, under the power of which the scholarly Dionysius surrendered, namely: "The times of this ignorance God winked

A Broadside on Public Affairs.

THE change in administration and the ceremonies of inaugurating a new President have inspired us to an editorial broadside on public affairs. We mean to keep in touch with the national life of this great Republic. Though the Christian's citizenship is in heaven, for the time being he has important duties here. And it is often the test of his citizenship there, to know how he performs his duty here.

OUR REPUBLICAN WAY.

We have chosen a straight-forward, honest man for President, and he has chosen eight other straight-forward, honest men to assist him as counselors and advisers. This is our republican way. It has worked well from the days of Washington; that is, for 106 years. Then, this nation was a third-rate power, having a population of scarcely four millions, and it took a week to go from Boston to New York in a stage-coach. During this period we have had among our Presidents at least seven remarkable men: Washington, the two Adamses, Thomas Jefferson, Andrew Jackson, Abraham Lincoln, and Ulysses S. Grant; certainly seven. And great emergencies have always developed our great men. The stock is not likely to be exhausted. We have had in the Presidential office a few common-place men; but no dishonest, no dishonorable ones. Webster said of the nomination of Gen. Taylor, that it was a nomination not fit to be made. It did not give us the ideal man. But, on the whole the Presidential average has been creditable to the nation. We believe, the present administration will prove no exception.

OBSERVING THE LORD'S DAY.

It is significant of the character of this nation, that we inquire where are our rulers on the Lord's Day. We have not put the name of God in our written constitution. But, we have put it in our unwritten one. We say our rulers must act as though they knew the fourth commandment, and meant to keep it. As Grover Cleveland worshipped with the Presbyterian Church, we are glad William McKinley worships with the Methodist Church. "Let every man be persuaded in his own mind."

THE GREAT INTERNATIONAL QUESTIONS.

International law is a plant of slow growth. It grows with the exigencies which demand the application of its principles. A Cabinet of eight Christian gentlemen led by the President, have now to determine how this nation shall keep the golden rule, as to Cuba, as to Turkey, and doubtless, too, as to the Hawaiian Islands. We can, all the more safely, trust them, because we know that on every Lord's day, they somewhere worship God in public. For our own part we want to see Cuba free, and Turkey swept from the face of the earth: always provided this is consistent with the Golden Rule of doing as we would like to be done by. Whether the time has come for us to treat Cuba and Hawaii as France once treated us, to help the other nations exterminate Turkey, and whether it can be done without violating the Golden Rule, the President and Cabinet are set to determine.

THE VOICE OF THE PEOPLE.

Mr. Bryan said the President is the people's hired man. That's suggestive of wages. Doubtless he is their representative. The President of this Republic will want to know what the people think on all these great international questions. He knows what they think about the tariff and the currency. They have put that in black and white. What do they think about Cuba and Turkey and Hawaii? He will not consult the filibusters. He will have them interrupted and arrested if he can catch them. But we are one of the family of nations; no longer a third-rate power, like Belgium, or Portugal, or Denmark to-day; but the equal of the greatest. We are to help set the fashion, as to when struggling nations should be encouraged. That we should lead in this direction is perfectly natural. This is the way we became a nation ourselves. We have on Lafayette Square in our national Capital a statue of Lafayette. What did he do? He did to us as we like to be done by. When the mother country, when the world was against us, he brought us the gospel of good cheer from France. Have we ever paid humanity that debt? The great men of this administration must decide.

ETHICAL QUALITY IN PUBLIC QUESTIONS.

If God is a factor in this period, we must count him in, when we make our decisions. We talk about a man's God-given rights. God-given! This means a great deal. If they are God-given, men have a right to take them against all odds. They have the right. As against the dominion of such a power as Spain, or the dominion of such a power as Turkey, no sensible man can doubt where are the sympathies of all the celestial inhabitants. But here comes the question of expediency. We had the right to our independence in 1776. But we had to demonstrate this right. That we did, has changed the destiny of this American Continent. We believe that God was in this change! Shall we still take our cue from him? If there are movements for larger freedom in the earth, to win God-given rights, what have we to say of them?

Was the Mayflower launched by cowards,

Steered by men behind their time?

Turn those tracks toward Past or Future.

That make Plymouth Rock sublime!

Professional Men.

WE hail the ever-increasing number of good doctors. It is a matter of congratulation that there are so many more skilled men to feel the world's pulse and rouse the world's torpid liver, and set the world's broken bones, and mix the world's medicines. People sometimes laugh, when well, at doctors, but send for them in hot haste when sick. To one case of malpractice there are a thousand cures. There are tens of thousands of people dead who would have been living if they had sent for a doctor in time. The army of medical science will be augmented until pneumonia and asthma and pleurisy and scarlet fever and marasmus and consumption will be driven off the edges of the world, and fever hospitals will become obsolete, and many years will be added to the average of human life, and the world's climate softened and invigorated, the earth shall be lit for millennial residence. But there is one phase of professional life, whether medical or legal, that most people fail to appreciate. We all sympathize with the struggle of the great masses of humanity for a livelihood, but fully as wearing and dreadful are the struggles of professional men to get established in medical practice, or in the forum—a fight goes on the story of which will not be told until the final reading of the scroll of the world's martyrs. Young doctors with diplomas starting out to get a practice excite all my sympathies. Old doctors are preferred on the supposition they have more experience, although many a young doctor has saved a life which the old doctor would have bungled and lanced and calomeled and jalaped into eternity. But there are a thousand prejudices to keep the young graduate of the medical college out of the field for which he is fully equipped. He has his library, and his lancets, and his stethoscope, and his stellimeter, and embrocation and antidotes, but no patients. He is perhaps sent up to the hospital to operate, on the heathenish supposition that the eyes and limbs of the poor are not of much importance, and no one will know the result of his cutting and slashing; but only by dint of strategy, or by the death of an old physician into whose partnership the young man went, can he enter into the endearing relation of family physician. While therefore, I read not long ago that 142 young doctors got their diplomas, I feel not only like congratulating society upon the event, but I must also utter my sympathy for those who took upon themselves the toils and embarrassments of this sublime profession. Success and eminence in such a calling is worthy of a struggle. It is no small honor to have their names on the roll with Valentine Mott and Rush and Harvey and Sydenham and Abernethy of the past, and the living doctors and surgeons of to-day, just as mighty as their predecessors. Do not let us expend all our sympathies on those who, illy compensated, toil with hand or foot, but let us have some of our most intelligent cordiality for those who, with delayed appreciation, toil with racked brain in their profession. I hail all young doctors and lawyers to their magnificent work. The offices of restoring the health and adjusting the wrongs of society are so grand a consummation that you ought to have the sympathy of all the people. Whether disciples of Blackstone or Esculapius I cheer you, and prophesy for you achievements which will fully repay all hardships.

Good Company.

WE notice it is becoming quite usual for men going to secular or religious conventions, to take the wife with them. It is generally cheaper to take your wife with you than to go without her. She keeps you from expenditures and associations and bargains that will cost you more than her tickets to and from the place of convention. There has been much platform jangling about man's rights and woman's rights, but the grandest right of man is the respect of a Christian wife, and the grandest right of woman is the affection of a Christian husband. If one's home is right he is all right; if one's home is wrong he is all wrong.

* * *

Nothing can be sadder to the angels of heaven and good people on earth, than the spectacle of two muscular men about to engage in an encounter to prove which of them can do the other the most physical injury in the ring. Yes, there is something. It is a country full of newspapers that are reporting, and citizens who are studying events unworthy of creatures themselves made in the image of God. We are great admirers of the mother country; but God forbid that in these respects the daughter shall be like her mother. If this is the only way to evolve American pluck, we say let us go without it. The Australian beat the American; we wish somehow both might have been defeated.

BRIEF NOTES.

The Total Abstinence Congress of Montana proposes to establish a bureau of information for the benefit of all temperance workers in the Northwest.

The Norwegian Government has passed a measure providing that employers who are convicted in any way coercing their workmen in political affairs shall be imprisoned and fined.

A London judge has decided that money put into the contribution box by mistake can be recovered, the custodians having no right to it, because it has become "an accepted offer to the Lord."

Recently published statistics show that the State of Massachusetts during the year there were 26,672 criminal convictions, of which 18,232 or 68.26 per cent were connected with crime.

The Free Church of Scotland Monthly states that Dr. Cross, the Society's minister on Lake Nyassa, Africa, has upon the roll school the names of three hundred children redeemed from slavery.

One of the prizes for meritorious service the interests of social uplift annually award France has been given to Miss Hocart, in recognition of her mission work in the slums of Paris. She is the daughter of a Wesleyan minister.

Since Mr. Moody left Boston the daily services have been continued by Dr. A. T. Pierson, Mr. Moody's committee, of which Mr. H. M. S. is the leading member, is making every effort to perpetuate the good results of the evangelistic campaign and a good portion of the religious public showing appreciation of the services.

German statistics show that the number of students in the Theological departments of universities of that country now number 2956, which is less than the number six years ago by 1571. Only universities showing an increase in the number of Theological students are the conservative universities of Griefswald and Erlangen.

The recent movement, initiated by the Christian Endeavor and Epworth League Union of Worcester, Mass., for the better enforcement of Sunday laws, has resulted in a more general observance of the Lord's Day. Five grocers and a cistern were brought into court at the beginning of the movement, and fined $20 each for violating the day laws.

The revival services, in Nebraska, conducted by Major Cole continue to bear fruit. A paper states: "In the smaller towns reached by Major Cole since closing the work at Hastings there have been 124 conversions. In the preliminary work in McCook there have been twelve conversions, making since the campaign began at Hastings, 819 conversions."

At the recent celebration of the ninety-third anniversary of the British and Foreign Bible Society, it was stated that nearly 4,000,000 Bibles, Testaments, and extracts—133,217 more than in 1804 had been issued in all parts of the world during the past year. The total number of copies distributed since 1804, when the Society was organized, amounted to 147,366,662.

The Lafayette Avenue Presbyterian Church Brooklyn, N. Y., had the gratification of receiving a hundred and three persons into church membership on March 21. Seventy-three of these were confession of faith, and were chiefly young people. Dr. Gregg, the pastor, was especially pleased, as was his last Lord's Day before sailing for the Island. He will carry with him pleasant memories of the service.

"Sister Charlotte" has consolidated her work at the Day Star Home for the reclamation of fallen women, with the Florence Crittenton Association, which has now forty-four homes in various cities. Mrs. Draper's work will in future be done in Philadelphia, but she expects to come to New York frequently to meet her converts and to take part in the work at the Florence Mission Bleeker Street.

Mr. McKenny, clerk of the United States Supreme Court, who held the Bible on which President McKinley took the oath of office is author for the statement that it opened to 11. Chron. 1, a verse upon which the President's lips seem to rest was the tenth, which reads: "Give me no wisdom and knowledge, that I may go out and not in before this people: for who can judge this people, that is so great?"

Rev. E. Payson Hammond has been holding meetings in Cincinnati, where a great revival is taking place under his leadership twenty-six years ago. Mr. Hammond had the pleasure of seeing among his most earnest workers men and women who were converted in that former revival. During the services this winter a large number of children and young people—by some of the workers estimated at well nigh a thousand—have pledged themselves to Christ.

Mr. Ira D. Sankey conducted services at Redlands, Calif., on March 7. The Los Angeles Herald describes the congregation which gathered in the Baptist Church to hear the famous singer, as "crowding the large edifice in every part." Mr. Sankey, having sung his new hymns, was asked to sing the old favorites, "Ninety and Nine," and other familiar songs. The audience joined in the choruses with enthusiasm, and will not soon forget the pleasure of Mr. Sankey's visit.

Dr. L. W. Munhall has closed his meeting at Oakland, Calif. All the churches uniting in the movement have received additions to their membership. During the meetings over six hundred persons made profession of faith. Dr. Albie Kummer, writing to the California Christian Advocate respecting the financial arrangements, speaks in the highest terms of Dr. Munhall's disinterestedness, and gives an emphatic contradiction to certain false reports which had been circulated to the detriment of the evangelist.

The Chicago correspondent of the Congregationalist mentions that while a notorious infidel lecture was in that city defaming the churches earnest Christians in the Pacific Garden Mission near by, were speaking of the love of Christ to hundreds of discouraged men; that a good congregation was gathered in the auditorium of the V. M. C. A. to listen to the gospel; that another was listening to it in the First Methodist Church, and that still another, which occupied every seat in Music Hall galleries as well as on the main floor, listened to Dr. Gungahis as he spoke of the evidence of a future life as given in literature.

The Mandalay Disaster.

FROM the far-away land of Upper Burmah comes the news of a great disaster. Mandalay, the capital of the country has been devastated by fire. Fifteen hundred houses were burned and seven thousand persons rendered homeless. The cablegram announcing the catastrophe gives no information as to the origin of the fire or the character of the district. It was probably the business center of the city, as the houses in the center occupied by the nobility are not so close together as to feed the fire to the extent indicated by the dispatch. The fire proper is peculiar. It consists of the parallelograms, one within another. In the center is the palace of the ex-king and the houses of the officers of his household. These are surrounded by a wall. Outside this enclosure, in a belt of equal width on all sides, are the houses of the nobility. These were rulers before Burmah was annexed to India. A wall surrounds this enclosure also, so that these privileged classes dwell between two walls. Outside the second wall are the merchants' shops and stores. These are laid out in streets crossing at right angles and following the conformations of the walls which they surround. Beyond this, and stretching out with less regularity to the country around, are the houses of the mechanics, clerks, laborers, etc. The entire population of the city is estimated at a hundred, and fifty thousand. In the poorer quarters, which were probably the cause of the fire, the houses are generally built of wood or bamboo and are roofed with the leaves of the cogon palm. Usually, they are raised several feet above the ground and rest on spiles of teak wood driven into the earth. They are substantial structures and would not easily be destroyed by a fire broke out in a dry and windy season. The city is rather modern. In 1853 its site was cultivated fields without any buildings save a few scattered farm-houses. The capital was then at Arrapura, a few miles to the south of Mandalay. That city was entirely destroyed by fire in 1810. It was visited in 1839 by a disastrous earthquake which overturned most of the houses and public buildings. It was partially rebuilt, and in 1856 the rebuilding of the present capital was begun. Arrapura was then deserted, and only the ruins of a few pagodas remain to show where a city of 170,000 population once stood. It had been the capital for about seventy years. Prior to that time the capital had been at Ava, a city whose name is ever memorable to American ears, as the scene of the long imprisonment of the sainted Adoniram Judson, whose devotion to missionary work in Burmah was almost apostolic. He gave his life unreservedly to the cause, toiling on in sickness and bereavement year after year until 1850, when, thirty-seven years after his first landing in the country, death closed his labors. He left behind him a dictionary of the difficult Burmese tongue, both of which are still used by the missionaries. Judson was long enough to see some of the fruits of his labors, but since his death other devoted missionaries have reaped a large harvest. The bulk of the people, however, remain faithful to Buddhism. Now the calamity has fallen on so many of them, it is more than ever sad that they do not know Him of whom his people testify: "He is our refuge and strength, a very present help in time of trouble." (Ps. 46: 1.)

Realed by the Roentgen Rays.
An attempt to defraud a Railroad Company in Baltimore, Md., has been foiled by the aid of the new rays. The Sun of that city says: A man recently presented himself at the office of the City and Suburban Railroad Company and claimed compensation, declaring that he had had one of his arms broken by a car of the company. He demanded $3,500 damages. His arm was tied up from the wrist to the elbow, and he pretended to be in great pain. Rather than go the expense of a lawsuit, the railroad company offered to compromise the claim by the payment of $100, which was refused. The company then thought of the X ray, and believing the claimant to be a fraud, they arranged to have a picture taken of the bones of the man's arm. The photograph showed that the bones were intact, and that they had never been fractured. When the bandages were removed from the arm the skin was found burned and discolored, and the physician who examined it said that it had been burned with acid. The man had evidently been injured in some way and not being able to collect damages for the injury had set up his false claim against the Company in the hope of extracting money. When he learned the nature of the examination it was proposed to make, he was anxious to accept the Company's offer but it was withdrawn. When men are able to do so much by the aid of this wonderful light, how foolish anyone must be to play the hypocrite in his sight in whose hand are all the resources of nature! Neither is there any creature that is not manifest in his sight; but all things are naked and opened unto the eyes of him with whom we have to do. (Heb. 4: 13.)

Beaten With His Own Arm.

The extraordinary results of an encounter with an intoxicated man were described in the New York daily journals a few days ago. A workingman and his wife were sitting down to an early breakfast, when they were startled by a loud rapping on the street door. The man went to the door and found there a tall, powerfully built stranger, who walked in without any ceremony. In a thick voice he demanded to know what his involuntary host was doing there, and bade him quit the house immediately. It was evident that the visitor was intoxicated, and had mistaken the house for his own. The rightful occupant tried to explain, but the intruder cut his explanation short with a volley of abuse, and seizing him roughly by the shoulders, tried to throw him out of the house. The other naturally resisted, whereupon the intoxicated man attacked him fiercely, and being much bigger and more powerful than his antagonist, was getting the better of the encounter. Seeing this, the workingman's wife went to her husband's assistance, and, seizing the stranger by the arm, tried to drag him off. The man endeavored to shake off her grasp, and threw her down, but the woman clung to him until at last, in the struggle, the arm to which she was clinging came off in her hands. Then she saw that it was an artificial limb, and so hard a one that it formed a good weapon. She and her husband beat the intruder with it about the head and shoulders so energetically that he was glad to escape. They were too exhausted to follow him, but later in the day they notified the police, who are now looking for their assailant. The police think the man will surely be caught, as he will want to recover possession of his artificial limb, which he left behind him. He is not the first man who has provided a weapon for his own discomfiture. When we fall in our conflicts with temptation, it is because there is something in us, some propensity, or doubt, or habit, of which the enemy takes hold and with which he wins the victory. Every Christian should search his nature to find out his proclivities to evil, against which he should be continually on his guard and having done all, should offer the prayer of the Psalmist:

Search me O God and know my heart: try me and know my thoughts; and see if there be any wicked way in me. (Ps. 139: 23.)

A Terrible Wreck.

One of the most distressing of recent stories of the sea is told by the survivors of the wrecked steamship Ville St. Vazaire which foundered off Cape Hatteras, N. C., on March 7. Although there were eighty persons on board the vessel, only four have, at the time of writing, reached New York. It was at first feared that no others had been saved, but there is now reason

York. How sad was the fate of those who died in the boat! It would have been better for them, as the event proved, if they had gone down with the ship. But as no ship was near to save them, it was natural that they should go in the boat and try to save themselves. So in heathen lands men often try to save their own souls by suffering. But their penances and self-inflicted tortures do not avail. We pity them and wish they knew better, but it is marvelous that in Christian lands there is sometimes the same ignorance. Though Christ stands ready to save all who put their trust in him, some men persist in looking for salvation to their own feelings, and trying to merit salvation.

To him that worketh not, but believeth on him that justifieth the ungodly his faith is counted for righteousness. (Rom. 4: 5.)

A Fatal Prey.

A remarkable instance of a duel in mid-air is told by a physician of Saratoga, N. Y., who is on a hunting expedition in Georgia. He says that a few days ago while lying half-asleep under a tree, he heard a dull thud behind him. He supposed it was caused by the fall of a dead branch, but on investigating, he found that it was a large hawk that had fallen. The bird was still alive, but was apparently dying. It was a powerful specimen whose wings measured over three feet from tip to tip. As no shots had been fired, the doctor was puzzled to account for the fall of the hawk; but on examining it he discovered the cause. The bird had seized a black snake in its talons and had down away with it. The snake had succeeded in coiling itself around the hawk's legs and, wriggling itself out of its grasp, had thrown a coil around its body. Gradually the coil had tightened until the hawk could not fly, and captor and prey fell together to the earth. The snake had escaped injury in the fall, but the bird was almost dead. It could not have known, when it seized the snake, the injury it was capable of doing. Men sometimes make a mistake as fatal to the life of their souls. They struggle to obtain an office, or a fortune, or some other prize, thinking it will make them happy and, when they have obtained it, they discover that it is dragging down to earth the soul that should have soared heavenward.

They that will be rich fall into temptation and a snare and into many foolish and hurtful lusts which drown men in destruction and perdition. (1. Tim. 6: 9.)

Danger of New Chemicals.

A warning is given by a medical journal against carelessness in the handling or conveyance of certain substances which were formerly regarded merely as chemical curiosities, but are now used so extensively as to have become commercial commodities and are made in large quantities. One of these is carbide of calcium, which on simply becoming moist evolves pure acetylene, which possesses a remarkably high illuminating power. The employment of this method of generating a gaseous illuminant for optic lanterns, for photographic purposes, and for lighting private dwelling houses, has already become widely-known. It is quite obvious that some restriction should be placed upon the sale and storage of this substance, as the gas it gives off is not only highly inflammable, but when in contact with air forms an explosive mixture. Already the British government has moved in the matter and has issued an order declaring it unlawful to keep carbide of calcium except in virtue of a license to be obtained from the local authority under the Petroleum act. With the order is a memorandum showing the character of the risks to be guarded against, and giving suggestions as to the nature of the precautions likely to be most effectual for securing safety. It is not proposed by the British Government to prohibit the making of light by means of this substance, but merely to prevent its being used by ignorant or careless persons, lest in seeking light, they do injury to themselves and their neighbors. It would be well if a similar provision were made as to the search for mental and spiritual luminants. The mischief that may occur in this search has a very ancient precedent.

When the woman saw that the tree was good for food, she took of the fruit thereof. (Gen. 3: 6.)

Conversion of Cornelius.

Sunday School Lesson for April 11.
Acts 10: 30-44. Golden Text Acts
10: 43. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

HILE God was so mightily using Peter, he was at the same time carrying on his education. Hitherto the ministry of this Apostle had been exclusively to the Jews, in accordance with the order immediately before his ascension: "Ye shall be witnesses unto me both in Jerusalem and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost parts of the earth." (Acts 1: 8.) Jerusalem and Judea Peter had understood; he had seen, and been used to confirm, the grace of God in Samaria, but it needed a special lesson from on high to enlarge his heart, and to make him fully believe that the God of Israel was visiting "the Gentiles to take out of them a people for his name." (Acts 15: 14.) God made use of Cornelius to teach Peter as he made use of Peter to teach Cornelius.

How the Work Began.

How this Roman centurion came to be "a devout man, and one that feared God with all his house, which gave much alms to the people and prayed to God alway," we are not told. Probably both Cornelius and the centurion of Matthew 8, Luke 7, were men of honest minds, open to conviction, only longing to know the truth, that, whatever it should cost, they might yield themselves up to it. Cornelius had probably heard much of the Scriptures in the Jewish synagogue at Casarea, and probably the one cry of his heart was to really know and have to do with God.

But Cornelius must be put to a test as to the way in which God should reveal himself. An angel appeared to him, and much as he desired to have some personal, definite communication with God, yet, when it came in this form, he was afraid. But the heavenly messenger reassured him, and he knew now by a message straight from heaven, that God regarded him, and that his prayers and alms had not been in vain. And yet, instead of giving him credit for prayers or alms the angel directed him to send to Joppa for Peter, who should tell him what he should do. There is a moment of anguish which comes in the history of almost every awakened soul, where the Spirit of God shows him that he is not saved, not really born again. All the earnest efforts to reform our past life, as long as we are occupied with them, afford us a certain satisfaction, they seem to us certain steps gained. But when we come to see that we, too, need some Peter, some messenger of God, or some very direct light by, or independently of, such a messenger, it is like cutting off a right hand or plucking out a right eye to acknowledge to ourselves that all our earnest desires and efforts and good deeds have not, in any sense, saved us. It was a yielded heart and an obedient will which awaited the coming of Peter, for whom he sent the same day by two servants and a centurion soldier, to whom he frankly told all that had passed between God's angel and himself.

While God thus prepared Cornelius he carried on his work in the soul of Peter. The messengers were on their journey and nearing Casarea, when a burden of prayer came upon Peter. How often before receiving a special and new light upon God's truth, some of us have experienced this great necessity to get alone with God and pray. God had something to communicate, and it was given him by a vision, in which he saw all manner of unclean beasts, forbidden by the law, and he heard a voice saying, "Rise, Peter, kill and eat." The inquirer had his message from heaven, and the teacher must have his: thus the one to the other. Peter objected. The unsaved inquirer was more ready to obey than the prejudiced Apostle! But God did not lose patience; he explained what Peter had never yet understood. In answer to his objection, "Not so, Lord; for I have never eaten anything that is common or unclean," he replied, "What God hath cleansed that call not thou common." Three times the test was applied to him and always with the same result. And Peter did not yet understand.

God Adapts

CASAREA, THE HOME OF CORNELIUS AS IT NOW APPEARS.

But while he doubted, Cornelius' messengers arrived, and inquired for him, and the same voice which had said, "Arise, Peter, slay and eat," declared, "Behold three men seek thee, Arise therefore, and get thee down, and go with them doubting nothing: for I have sent them." Hearing from them the story of the Gentile seeker, the now convinced Peter went with them. Oh, what a journey! His little views of the power and efficacy of the blood of Christ had received a wonderful enlargement. What, did the redemption of Christ take in even the Gentiles? Could it be that the same Holy Spirit who filled him, and whose voice was the guide of his every step: could it be that he had awakened this honest Roman? Peter was in a new world, the barriers of years were broken down, and the rigid Jew could call any man, every man brother, since his Lord had also died for him.

It was a touching moment when the humbled seeker and the humbled Apostle met, both of them taking the lowest place. We can come near to any man who is honest when we take the lowest place. All Peter's national pride and conscious superiority had given way; he was a learner side by side with Cornelius, and as they told one to the other the way the Lord had led them, sympathy and oneness sprang up between them. God told me to send for thee, on the one hand, and God told me to come to thee, on the other, explained all. And Cornelius, who understood the import of this unparalleled opportunity, had gathered together his kinsmen and near friends that they, as well as he, should learn the way of salvation; and he said to

Peter, "Now therefore are we all here present before God, to hear all things that are commanded thee of God."

Peter found, where he had least expected it, an honest and good heart (Luke 8: 15); and the influence of Cornelius upon the members of his family, friends, and dependents was so great, that they, too, seem to have been as much prepared as he himself was for the message from on high. Beginning with his own newly learned lesson, he went on to preach Jesus of Nazareth: his life, his death and resurrection, and the personal witness to his resurrection which he and those who were with him could bear. And having thus declared the truth he began to apply it, and say: "He commanded us to preach unto the people, and to testify that it is he which was ordained of God to be the Judge of quick and dead."

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

IT is difficult at this distance of time to realize the momentous character of the event described in the lesson. We are unable to fully grasp the proud exclusiveness of the Jewish mind. The Jew believing himself a member of a race peculiarly favored of God, divinely appointed to be the custodian of the truth, forbidden to intermarry with other races, or even eat with members of another race, separated and isolated to keep him from spiritual contamination, held himself aloof and looked down almost with contempt on other peoples as being a Jew, and Peter must not despise him. He accordingly returns with the messengers and finds Cornelius with a number of friends gathered at the house to hear the Gospel.

Cornelius also had had a vision in which he had sent to Joppa for Peter. There is some doubt as to the position Cornelius occupied in relation to Judaism. He may have been a proselyte, that is, a man pledged to worship God but not formally received into Judaism, nor required to obey the Levitical law. But it is more probable that he was even a proselyte. It is more likely that being stationed as part of the Roman garrison at Casarea, he was brought into contact with Judaism and had made study of the Jewish scriptures and a devout, spiritual-minded, benevolent man, was attracted by their high principle without reaching the point of uniting with the Jewish religion. He was aware of Jewish prejudice against men like him to which Peter frankly referred, but he calculated on his responding to his invitation and had gathered his friends together to hear what he would have to say. The company Peter preached. His sermon a plain, simple, direct statement of the report of it contains no appeal, gentle invitations such as we are accustomed to hear from the pulpit, but it seems to have been effective. We gather that they were converted. They were probably men like Cornelius, and may have been his brother officers. The name of Cornelius would correspond about that of a captain in our army. He had a name of centurion implies, about a hundred men under him, a garrison doubtless composed of several of the same rank would naturally be on intimate terms with him. Nothing is recorded about him, there are traditions about one of which says he built a Christian church at Casarea, and another says that he left the army and became a bishop, but of these there are no positive proofs. The conversion of special interest because his being the first Gentile to enter the Church, the leader of the mighty host of Gentiles who have since his time accepted Christ.

Thou hast well done that thou art come. Cornelius was a benevolent, God-fearing man before Peter's visit, but his life afterwards would be much more fruitful. Dr. W. Arnold says that in the Garden of Plaisance in Paris there was a very rare tree which grew and flourished several years. Year by year it was covered with blossoms year by year the white blossoms were on the ground, leaving no fruit on the tree. At last, one season, although the extraordinary had been observed, the flower came fruit; it grew and ripened. Another tree of the same species had been planted in the adjoining garden and blossomed at the same time. The white dust of the blossoms had been carried on the feet of insects or had been wafted by the wind from one plant to the other. Then the plant had borne fruit. So the life of Cornelius was vivified by the Gospel, brought to him by the Apostle.

God is no respecter of persons. A man-colporteur writes that he was at an out-of-the-way Prussian town when Prince Bismarck, then Imperial Chancellor, had a country house. He was told that any one might go to the Chancellor's house to evening prayers. He went and found a spacious room filled with farmers, keepers and villagers. Soon the great master entered and, nodding affably to one and another whom he recognized, walked to the reading desk and opened the Bible. Glancing over the company, his quick eye detected the presence of a stranger. He turned and asked some one near the new comer was. Being told, he said: "I understand we have a Bible man with us to night. I want him to come and conduct the service." The stranger protested that he had come to listen could not think of displacing his highness, "Highness, nonsense," said the Prince. "We are in the presence of God and his sight what difference is there. We are all sinners and he regards us all in the same light. Come and lead the service."

infinitely inferior to himself. Other nations might be more wealthy, more powerful, more cultivated, but no nation could approach the Jews in the proud distinction of being the favorites of the one true God. It would seem that eight years after the Ascension, the Apostles still retained this exclusiveness. They had no other conception of Christianity than that of its being a Jewish sect, destined by its inherent excellence, to become paramount in Judea. The idea of admitting Gentiles to participation in the faith does not appear to have occurred to them. Divine interposition was necessary to open the way. Peter, who was still at Joppa, after the raising of Dorcas, going up to the housetop to pray, has a vision. He dreams that he sees a sheet let down by its four corners and within it, beasts of all kinds. The only animals the Jew was permitted by the law to eat, were those which chew the cud and divide the hoof. All others were forbidden as unclean. But Peter hears a voice bidding him kill and eat. He answers, as any Jew of his time would answer, that he did not eat anything common or unclean. The voice reproves him for calling anything that God had cleansed, common or unclean. Puzzled as to the meaning of this spectacle, he is still meditating on it, when three men come to the house to ask him to go to Casarea, a town about thirty miles away, the seat of the Roman governor, to visit Cornelius, an officer of the Roman army. Possibly at another time he might have declined, Cornelius being a Roman Gentile; but the meaning of the vision seemed to apply to the case. Cornelius was a good man, though he was not

In Lovely Sicily.

The Dreamland of Poets, Painters, and Lovers of the Beautiful—Charming Picturesqueness of its Scenery.

ANY and varied as are the scenic beauties of the Mediterranean islands, there are few that can be compared with the idyllic loveliness of the Sicilian shore. Bays that seem like semi-circles of gold girt, by white sandy beaches, or

Fishing, fruit-growing, and agriculture constitute the chief employment of the laboring class. The coast is bold and rocky, but the bay is a limpid sheet of water unruffled by a single breaker and reflecting the bold outline of Etna with its long, sloping, snowy sides, and its crater continually darkening the sky with the dense clouds of smoke it belches forth—a reminder of past terrors and others yet to come. But the Sicilian peasants in the vineyards below, the bare-footed fishermen, or the pulse-gathering children among the rocks, view the great mountain and Christian to be "clean every bit." That which works injury to the body, must affect the moral being. Self-indulgence in anything that is known to be hurtful becomes a sin, writes Rev. R. M. Donaldson. Temperance in all good things and total abstinence in all harmful things should be the rule of every Christian. It is incontrovertible that simple diet and simple habits of life tend to promote healthy morals as well as a healthy body. It is not a matter of opinion or inference how we treat the body, for the condition of the tenement largely determines the condition of the tenant. This principle is recognized by the rescue missions in our large cities where a bath, clean clothes and a warm supper are made the preliminaries to a presentation of truth for the inner man. Self-respect is often the vestibule to respect for God.

Pictures at School.

Who does not remember the peculiarities of the little comrades we met at the old fashioned country school. There is a little girl, crying over her lesson. Why cannot somebody show her? Napoleon getting his ammunition wagons over the Alps had nothing to do compared with the tug of a little child making her first trial at spelling. The alphabet to many has been twenty-six tortures. Here stands a little girl with her finger in her mouth. A boy is looking through a sheet of paper, which he has rolled into a scroll like a telescope—he is probably an astronomer in the early stages. Here is a plodding boy, prying away at his books. He suffers many impositions from his comrades.

A YEAR IN HEAVEN.

ONE year among the angels, beloved, thou hast been:
One year has heaven's white portal shut back
the sound of sin;
And yet no voice, no whisper, comes floating down from thee,
To tell us what glad wonder a year of heaven may be.

Our hearts before it listen—the beautiful closed gate;
The silence years around us; we listen and we wait.
It is thy heavenly birthday, on earth thy lilies
bloom;
In thine immortal garment canst find for these no room?

So, when the sky seems bluer, and when the blossoms wear
Some tender, mystic shading we never knew was there.
We'll say, "We see things earthly by light of sainted eyes;
She bends where we are gazing, to-day, from Paradise."
—LUCY LARCOM.

A SPRING SYMPTOM.

AT this season of the year, when the frost is coming out of the ground and there is widespread complaint of grip and spring fever, this little sketch of personal experience from Dr. Talmage's pen will be appreciated:

You begin without any apparent reason to feel very tired, awfully tired. You become seriously aware that you have a great many bones, and are convinced that your limbs have a great superfluity of ossification. You begin to yawn till any chicken with the gapes would think you were caricaturing the diseases of the barnyard. You stretch, without any seeming idea as to what you are putting out your hands for. You button up one button of your coat. You walk round the house, and then fasten two buttons. You walk up stairs, and fasten all the buttons. You lie down on the clean white spread, boots and all. Your wife, after criticizing your taste in going to bed with boots on, puts on you all the blankets she can find; and you shout, "More cover!" She hunts up all the shawls, and piles them up in woolen pyramid. She gets out two or three old dresses, and puts them on; and you cry, "Give us more cover!" Considerably frightened, she lays on the top of the pile her best dresses. She puts on the top of this the children's clothes, and then gives solidity to the mass by adding two pillows; and through your chattering teeth you exclaim, "More cover!" You feel that you are making the Arctic expedition in search of John Franklin, and that the friendly Esquimaux are rubbing you down with a couple of small icebergs. Your tongue is a hailstone, and your nose an icicle.

Suddenly the climate changes from arctic to torrid. Your wife lifts the two pillows; but still you are too hot, and your wife takes off the layer of children's clothes. But by this time you are like a buried Titan, and away fly off from your struggling limbs the tertiary, cretaceous, carboniferous strata of old dresses and new dresses, shawls and blankets. You wonder why a big blanket is called "a comfortable." You want air. You want fans. You have an oven in your head, three cooking-stoves under your diaphragm; and if one earns bread by the sweat of his brow, you have shed enough to buy out several bakeries.

The ague is not all disquieting after you get sufficiently used to it. The trouble with us was, not that we had the ague, but that we did not keep the place long enough to get used to it. We have no patience with those plain, matter-of-fact people who can see no poetry in the ague. They have no appreciation of any great physical enterprise. We have it to boast that, while some neighbors beat us in the size of their turnips, and the flavor of their strawberries, we beat them all in the shakes.

SIGHT OF MOUNT ETNA.

by town, precipitous rocks, are entrances to verdurous paradises. In that deliciously semi-tropical climate the soil produces fruits of the most exquisite flavor, and flowers of the richest hue. Sicily in geographical and historical importance is the reatest of all the Mediterranean islands. When the Scythians (who are believed to have crossed over the straits to the island, about the eleventh century B. C., long before the founding of the Greek settlements), settled there, they found the island already inhabited by the Sicani, who appear to have been of Spanish or Italian descent. Then came the Greeks, who doubtless gave to the island its first impulse toward town life and the civilized arts. They found the islanders dwelling in hill-top villages, the Siculi, who had formed settlements along the coast. These early days of Sicily are, however, vague and legendary. The island is mentioned in the Homeric poems and elsewhere as people by tribes who regularly bought and sold slaves. There is no doubt of its very great antiquity. In 735 B. C., Naxos was founded. Shortly afterward arose Syracuse and Katana (the modern Catania), Agrigento (Girgenti), Messina (Messina), and other settlements were founded. The island has had a most eventful history, but amid all its changes, it has retained many of its earlier characteristics, and its people have always been noted for their brave, independent spirit, the love of liberty and of art—an inheritance from their early Greek ancestors and associations.

Our photographs present two very beautiful views of a portion of the eastern side of Sicily, in the near neighborhood of Etna, the famous volcanic mountain. Back of the coast, and for a distance of twenty miles in either direction, the lava flows of the volcano stand out in bold cliffs and white promontories. The whole island is volcanic, and seismic disturbances are not infrequent.

In the vicinity of Taormina, life among the lower classes, at least, is very simple.

its rumblings with indifference. To them the harvest of the bay or the fields is of far greater importance than the mutterings of the old mountain. Their gardens and orchards—and certain parts of the island are little else than a succession of them—contain many varieties of fruits: olives, almonds, pomegranates, figs, carob, pistachio, mulberry, and vine. In cereals: the crops are wheat, barley, oats, beans, and maize. There are about three hundred sulphur mines in operation, this being the chief mineral product of the island and a source of considerable revenue.

Cleanliness and Self-respect.

It should be a moral principle with us to preserve our bodies in the best possible condition for the service of the Lord. A converted pugilist, now a successful evangelist in London, was heard to say, in a very kindly way, to a young man who was smoking on the deck of a Mediterranean steamer: "Before I was converted I used to enjoy my pipe. But when God saved me, he taught me that he wanted me to be every bit clean." So does he want every

When a joke is told, the children laugh, he will turn around with a bewildered look, imagining himself the victim of the satire, but next day will cackle out in the quiet of school-time at the sudden discovery of the meaning of the witticism. But he may yet outstrip them all. There a boy makes faces, and the whole school is in danger of running over with giggle. It is an awful thing for a child not to dare to laugh when the merriment arises, and wells up till the jacket gets tight, and the body is a ball of fun; and he knows that if out of one of the corners of his compressed lips a snicker should escape, all the boys would go off in explosion. There! to severely correct them, a boy and a girl are placed beside each other—a style of punishment greater at that age than ever after. Here is a boy making way with an apple behind his lifted book. Just outside the school-room door is a boy showing his strength. As he turns up his arm in the light, he says, "Do you see that muscle?" There will be no Sunday School books made about him, although out of his brawn of body, and mind, and soul, there may yet come a Cromwell, or a Luther.

CHAPTER VIII—Contd.

BY

AMELIA E. BARR.

JOHN made no attempt to interfere, he knew that Alice's decision to bring happiness to them must be self-evolved. And yet while his dearest hopes were thus held in abeyance he did not suffer as constantly as Alice did. The longing for John's respect and regard never left her heart, never once did she feel that his opinion "made no difference." On the contrary her first thought about every event that touched her was, "what will John think of it?" This pervading quality in love is essentially a feminine attribute; the great majority of men remain unconscious of the strength of their affections, for their occupations prevent them making them as women do the subject of their constant contemplation. So then while Alice's love flavored all the small exercises and social functions of her days, John's—though of really more vigorous and potent character—was compelled to give place to duties that were necessary and imperative.

Indeed his duties as regarded Mr. Lloyd had gradually assumed not only a very extensive but also a very grave character. It was impossible any longer to ignore the changes that had taken place in the man. These changes, remittent and insidious, had puzzled John so much at first that he had come to believe there were two Nicholas Lloyds, and that sometimes the one and sometimes the other had the ascendancy. One of these was a prudent, forecasting, farseeing business man, the other a reckless, plunging, visionary speculator. One was a man of extreme dignity, inclined to avarice, reticent and reserved, the other was a practical joker, boastful, extravagant and egotistical. The latter character at the beginning of his engagement came only very seldom to the front, but it had now become alarmingly evident, and in the early summer John felt that Mrs. Lloyd's attention if not already drawn to the fact ought to be aroused.

One day while these thoughts were forced upon him, a letter from Lord Medway arrived. Mr. Lloyd was greatly excited. He read it to John with such extravagant comments as "She must be willing—I'll have no drawbacks now—I'll give her all I promised and ten times more—I'll give her the State of New York if he wants it—she is going to be a lady. She may become a Countess—she may be anything she likes—I'll find the cash for it—John, I want you to write to Lord Medway at once—No, I'll write myself. I'll double Miss Lloyd's fortune—"

"Sir, permit me to write for you," said John. "It is not well to let these Englishmen value themselves too much."

"To be sure," he answered with a sudden caution. "I thought last year he did not think enough of my girl and my money."

"He could not, sir, for the first article of the creed in which Lord Medway has been brought up, is, the inherent superiority of Englishmen. They not only call all other nations 'foreigners,' but they feel that their existence is an anomaly hard to be explained, without discrediting a wise and good providence."

"Come, come, John! You are too hard. Medway is a fine fellow; and any woman that marries him is a fortunate woman. I will answer him myself."

There was then no more to be said; but that afternoon John went out to Lloyd Park to see Mrs. Lloyd. She received him with enthusiasm. She was honestly glad to see him, and she let him feel her pleasure. Then she entered at once into a description of what she had accomplished and of what she was doing. John told her he had seen her new "Homes" and said they were all that could be desired. He did not tell her, however, how severely he had heard working men and women criticize them. He did not tell her that the children quite neglected the play room she had made for them, and still played, by preference, in the streets.

He did not tell her that the women refused to use the common laundry, and resolutely did their washing in their kitchens. He could have pointed out these and many other disagreeable results of her efforts, but since Steve had not named them, he also kept silent.

He understood Steve's motive, for one day he said to him very despondently—"John, I see that men and women have to be taught to love order and cleanliness. They are no more natural products than are honor and truth. Here and there a soul brings such attributes into the world with it; but mostly, they have to be acquired. And when men and women have learned dirty, slovenly ways, how can you expect them to undo old habits, and learn new ones by simply putting them into new conditions? It won't work." Then John had asked: "What is to be done, Steve? Can you not reason with them?" and Steve had answered:

"Reason with ignorant men and women set in their own ways and opinions? You might as well go about to convince a bull! I have come to the decision that progress is a plant that grows very slowly. We can't have an era per annum, John; and yet the temper of to-day looks to results, and to results rapidly achieved. Do we take centuries to raise elaborate cathedrals now? No, we build our modern churches on contract. That illustrates our ideals; whether they be good or bad, I am not prepared to say."

Steve made these remarks with such an air of despondency and utter weariness that it troubled John for many days, and this feeling was renewed on his visit to Mrs. Lloyd's, for he met Steve in the park with just the same dissatisfied expression.

"What is the matter with you, Steve?" he asked, laying his arm across his brother-in-law's shoulder.

"Oh, John, how good it is to see you! What is the matter? The old, tired-of-everything feeling. Life is such a monotonous go-over-and-over, for no good end, that I can see. Here is mother wasting her money and her life, and not one of the people she is trying to help cares whether she lives or dies."

"Gratitude is the last virtue learned, Steve. Your mother is not working for man's or woman's gratitude, or she may as well give up at once. I am sorry she is not well. Your father, I think, is seriously ill. He ought to go away from business of every kind. Travel might be good for Mrs. Lloyd also. I am going to speak to her about it. How is Jessie?"

"Well—but—"

"But what?"

"Nothing—she has the disease also."

"What disease?"

"She is out of love with life. That 'something that infects the world, has touched her as well as the rest of us. We are a lot of dissatisfied creatures. There are so many things to want now, and we want them all. I would like to be in the heart of the mountains to-day with a crust and a fiddle, and a stream of running water."

He laughed as he said the words, and went off at his usual swinging pace, with a backward look at John full of feeling. And John was more troubled than he had been before. Steve was changed. How he was changed, he could not instantly say, his clear face reflected such a complexity of emotion, but as he went forward to Mrs. Lloyd's room he suddenly said to himself, and without any reasoning towards the decision, "I must go and see Jessie."

This thought was with him all the time he was listening to Mrs. Lloyd's plans and expectations. Of Steve's depression she said nothing, so that it was likely Steve had kept his trouble—whatever it was—to himself, and John felt no obligation to bring it to her notice. He spoke, however, with great emphasis about Mr. Lloyd's eccentricities, which he said "could be no longer regarded as peculiarities of temperament."

"You think he is ill?"

"I do. Lord Medway's letter to-day excited him very much."

before she saw him coming, and it gave him some confidence and comfort. He knew intuitively that the letter in her hand was from Lord Medway, and that she was thinking about its contents, and yet the expression on her face was not that of a woman dreaming happily of a lover; it was that of one who weighs and considers, who is perplexed and suffers, and is in a strait betwixt two.

She rose as John came near her, slipped the letter into her work-bag, the trees bending and swaying above her head a look as irresolute as herself as she waited for John's approach. They stood silently, and she was the first to speak. The words were all questions: her hand trembled as it lay in John's hand, and she was nervously at the point of tears.

"Have you been well? Is it not a day? Have you seen mother—and the bees as you came by the limes, are not busy?" she asked with that pretense of interest which would fain believe the true one.

John answered none of these questions. He said simply: "Will you sit down or do you prefer to walk? I have something to say to you."

She sat down and John stood leaning against the tree at her side. "Alice," he said, "I came here purposely to find you. Unfaithfulness is a thing I have never understood, yours least of all. Tell me before we part forever what I said or did to deserve your anger or indifference."

"Do not say 'indifference.' I have never been indifferent to you, nor since the hour we met. Several things have angered or annoyed me, and others have drawn me this way or that way from you. Also you are much to blame, for you have come more and more seldom to the house; you have avoided me when you did come; you have worn an air of injury that was unjust to me, because, at first, there was no reason for it."

"In short, dear Alice, there has been a thorough misunderstanding."

"One that you might have explained away while it was but a little shadow. You were too proud to do so. You were too busy with money, and real estate, and political and social questions, to care for my trifling feelings. If I had been an over-worked factory hand you would, perhaps, have wondered what made me so pale and unhappy, because I am rich, you would have said I cared only for myself, or that I was false and proud."

"These are hard charges, Alice. I do not think they are not fair ones."

"Do me the justice to think a little for me, and you will understand how fair they are."

"I would much rather throw myself at your mercy. If you have even thought me wrong, then I have been wrong. Forgive me, dearest. I know we must part, but I cannot bear to part in anger."

"You know we must part. So come to tell me so—to renew all my love for you—to make me feel wretched in losing of you—if you can. This is my love! I think it a very selfish thing, would have slipped out of your heart so and imperceptibly, as unobserved in going as possible. I would rather have been misjudged than have given you an additional heartache. I would rather have suffered wrong than let you suffer from wounded love and self-appreciation. If love is not unselfish it is nothing at all. 'You know we must part,' this is what I seek me out to tell—Oh, John! How cruel! If we are to part why should you try to give me more heartache?"

"Alice! Alice! I love you. I love you only. I shall love you forever. Forgive what has been wrong or unkind."

"When forgiveness is asked too late is an additional wrong. You know that Lord Medway has renewed his offer—you must have seen his letter to my father—now you try to embarrass my actions, prejudice my future, to disappoint my father, to make me miserable by coming to me as you have done. John, it was a cruel thing to do, it was a foolish thing also, for it sets my heart in revolt against you."

UNIVERSAL BROTHERHOOD

How the Religion of Christ May be Tested—The True Christian Loves a Men and Strives to Help Them.

E John was probably quite an old man when he wrote the Epistle, the third chapter of which is the basis of the Topic. A tender, paternal, affectionate tone pervades the whole letter, as if the writer had grown very kindly and charitable in his old age. He was anxious that his readers should understand the essentials of the Christian faith and distinguish between them and the non-essentials. He insists on holiness and a life, but more than all on the love for others, which he raises to a test of real godliness. The man who does not love his brother has, according to this apostle, no business in the Christian church. He does not think that a man who loves God if he does not love his brother. It is not right thinking, or orthodoxy that John looks to as the best proof of Christian character, but the affectionate disposition, the kindness and usefulness that is ready to help another and to do the best of others. Conduct and affection are placed side by side. The good man is he that doeth righteousness and the child of God is he who loves his brother. By these two tests every man can find his spiritual parentage. Love marks the child of God and hate the child of the devil. Protestation and profession and unreachability orthodoxy do not count with this teacher. He asks what the man's life is. If he is doing the works of God, avoiding sin and showing kindness and helpfulness to others, there is no reason for believing him to be a child of God. He bears the family likeness and resembles his Father in heaven whose name is love. Not that right thinking and right belief should be ignored, but they are of no importance. They are necessary because, as a man thinketh in his heart, so is he. But when we are looking for proofs of the divine nature in ourselves or others, it is of disposition and conduct that we must take account. The Topic, however, is chiefly concerned with the objects of this love. This is Christianity's crowning glory. It includes love that is world-wide. It does not include that of the selfish, with oneself, or limited to our household, nor to our own countrymen. It goes out to the whole world. Still harder, it goes out to our enemies and to those who have done us injury and are seeking opportunity to do more injury. This is the vast step in love that Christianity has taken. The Christian is to be so permeated with love that he have within him a spring or fountain so inexhaustible that there is no limit to its operations. Neither distinction nor difference of race, nor unworthiness is to be a barrier. The Samaritan is spread for doing good to the man who hates him and despises him. The very men who are inflicting torture on the suffering Saviour are the objects of compassion and he pleads with his Father to take their ignorance into account when he judges men. This is the example it is so difficult to follow. This it is which shows that the new nature has been imparted. When we read, for instance, of the massacre in Armenia, our pity went out naturally to the victims; but it was difficult to feel that the brutal soldiery were our brothers, too, for whom we ought to feel compassion. Yet how much they need it! So misguided, so demoralized, so brutalized, so inhuman! They are more to be pitied than their victims. This is the real power of the religion of Christ. For who have his spirit are like the Father, kind unto the unthankful and the evil. Truly, as we think of this attainment and draw it into our own hearts, where we find natural indignation and hatred and resentment, we learn the meaning of Christ's words, "Ye must be born again." Yet as Christianity takes a deeper hold on men, as the world gets a clearer view of Christ's principles, we see the effects as John depicts them in this chapter. How many readers of this journal are at the present moment denying themselves in order that they may be like the pariahs of India may have the same people whom they have never seen recognized as brothers, and like brothers we give, that they may be fed. By this we show that we are Christ's disciples.

TEACH ME, LORD, TO PRAY.

ARE YOU DRIFTING?

TEACH me, Father, by thy spirit
When I stand before thy face,
How to ask for needed guidance,
How to seek thy helpful grace.
When within my closet kneeling—
There with earnestness appealing—
With thy Word its light revealing,
Sanctify that place.

I would come into thy presence,
Tarry with thee all the day;
Seek to catch thy faintest whisper,
Hear thy dictates and obey.
With my earnest heart thus yearning,
With thy Spirit's aid discerning,
In thy school I shall be learning—
Learning how to pray.

I've been slow to learn the lessons
Which have come from day to day;
But thy patience, Lord, has conquered,
And I love thy righteous way;
I would give my best endeavor,
From thy holy presence, never Would I stray, if thou wilt ever
Teach me, Lord, to pray.

ARE you drifting with the current
As it gently flows along?
Or resisting all allurements
To a line of conduct wrong?
Spread your sails to catch the breezes,
Setting toward the Beulah land,
And direct your bark according
To the Master's right command.

Are you drifting with the current Setting from the golden strand?
Or exerting every power
Evil forces to withstand?
Seek and catch the precious breathings
Of the Spirit of the Lord,
And for pilot take the Master
Of the stormy seas aboard.

Are you drifting with the current
Flowing gently but away
From the harbor of salvation
To the breakers of dismay?
Lift a cry for help to Jesus,
Stronger than the swiftest tide;
And into the peaceful harbor
You will surely, safely glide.

TIMES OF THE GENTILES.

Their Approaching Termination in the Deliverance of Palestine from Turkish Control.

THE year 623 B. C. is, I believe, the date for the commencement of the first kingdom of the prophetic image described in Daniel 2: 31-45—the Babylonian—the "Head of Gold." Taking the "Times of the Gentiles" as being equal to the seven times of Israel's punishment (a "time" being the Jewish prophetic year of 360 days; on the year-day basis 360 years), we have seven times 360—2,520 years. If we are right as to this start-point date, we find this long period closes apparently in 1897-8.

If the times of the Gentiles are really the great period of 2,520 years—as we believe—and these end in 1897-8, then it follows that this Scripture must needs be fulfilled in connection with Jerusalem. We may expect to see "the hand of the Turk taken from the throat of Palestine" in 1897-8, or thereabouts, and the land and the city possessed again by their rightful owners, either independently, by autonomy, or by the Jews being put in by the nations, as, so to speak, their "man in possession."

The first half of the great period of the "seven times" of the Gentiles extends from the head to the ankles, from the commencement of the Babylonian "head of gold" dynasty, to the close of the Roman "legs of iron" dynasty—i.e., 623 B.C. to 636-7 A.D. From 636-7 A.D. we have to reckon the other half of this great period 1,260 years, which brings us to 1896-7—represented on the figure by the feet. This completes the 2,520 years. The toes, then, represent the further and latest period during which things will go rapidly from bad to worse. Wickedness will be intensified to a degree probably not understandable by us at present. "When the transgressors are come to the full," then the "king of fierce countenance and understanding dark sentences" (Dan 8: 23), "the man of sin," the Antichrist, will be revealed; his power consolidated; his covenant made with the Jews, and broken in the midst of the last week of seven years. "The time of Jacob's trouble," and "the great tribulation," fill up the latter half of this week. Then follows the smiting of the image upon its feet (toes), by "the Stone cut without hands," and the "setting up of the kingdom which shall never be destroyed, the kingdom which shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall endure forever" (Dan 2: 44). The first stage or phase of this glorious kingdom will be the reign of the thousand years on and over the earth.

This, however, we believe to be certain, from Holy Scripture, that "the Church," the "body" of Christ, will certainly not pass through the great tribulation. "The Tribulation," "the time of Jacob's trouble," is to close the last great week of seven years. Therefore, the "body," as it does not pass through this terrible time, will have been removed beforehand. When? This we cannot answer. Whether directly before the tribulation (of the last three and a-half), or before the commencement of the last seven years, or immediately after the fulfilling of "the times of the Gentiles," we do not know.

But although we cannot answer specifically this question of absorbing interest, this we do know, that at the appointed time—whenever that may be—"The Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first; then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air; and so shall we ever be with the Lord" (1. Thess. 4: 16-17).

It is possible, however, that the catching away of the "body"—the "rapture of the saints"—may make the fulfillment of the times of the Gentiles. We know from many Scriptures that the world will increase in intensity of wickedness until it ends in the great apostasy—the rejection of everything belonging to the true Christ, and the reception of everything belonging to the false Christ. This will occur when the true body of believers has been removed from the earth and is safe from the persecution of Antichrist. That is the event now impending.

ALL SUNDAY SCHOOLS INTERESTED.

Still More Phenomenal Records Received in the Competition for the Continuous Attendance Championship.

GEORGE D. WOGLOM.
RECORD, NINE YEARS.

WHEN THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, several weeks ago, published the ten-year record of a bright little Sunday School boy out in a Western state, with the comment that he was claimed to be the champion Sunday School pupil of the Union, it was not expected that the publication would stir up a friendly rivalry of such mammoth proportions as that which speedily followed. The wonderful records that have been received make a showing that must be a surprising revelation to thousands of teachers and superintendents all over the country. During the week, the popular interest in the contest has not diminished. Names of new candidates are coming in, and being added to our list every day. Letters from pastors, superintendents, teachers and parents show that they are watching the progress of this friendly town the last Sunday in May, 1883—making forty years attendance next May, and thirteen years eight months to Feb. 1, 1897 without a break, or 2,080 Sundays with only one absence. I have also attended the same church service every Sunday morning and evening during the forty years when there was a service in the church.

LINUS BIRDSEY.

Here are some other letters of interest: STAUNTON, GA. This is to certify that Alma W. Newham has not missed a Sunday in Sunday School for seven years and six months, from Sept. 1, 1889 to Feb. 1, 1897. She was ten years old the 23d of Feb., 1897.

W. D. Hoge, Superintendent Staunton Baptist Sunday School.

TOUGHKENAMON, Pa. We send two names who have made a good record of attendance at Sabbath School. My attention was not called to this contest until last week, but hope it is not too late now to have these names enrolled. Raymond Owen, aged sixteen, has been present every session for five years and three weeks. His brother, Clyde Owen, in his tenth year, has been present for 267 consecutive Sabbaths. They are members of the Presbyterian Sunday School of Toughkenamon, Mr. J. M. Yeatman, Superintendent.

MISS S. HUGHES, Secretary.

HINESBURGH, Vt. Ruth Anna Beecher commenced Sunday School service April, 1892, when two years of age, and lost one Sunday in Feb., 1896 through illness, making five years with only one absence. Her home is three miles from the church.

competition with quite as much enthusiasm as are the contestants themselves. Sunday School children in every part of the Union are eagerly coming forward with records they may well be proud of, some showing many years of faithful attendance.

Miss Jennie G. Moseley, of the First Parish Unitarian Church, Dorchester, Mass., has attended Sunday School for twelve years and eight months, and has not missed one Sunday in that time. Miss Margaret Grosz has been a member of the Throop Avenue Mission Sunday School of Brooklyn, N. Y., for eight years and four weeks, and in that time has attended three hundred and seventy sessions. Freddie Surbeck, of the Presbyterian Sunday School of Newtown, L. I., has a record of five years and thirteen weeks without an absence. Frederick H. Grant, of St. Paul's M. E. Gunn, ten years old, has attended the Evangelical Congregational Church Sunday School, Uxbridge, Mass., for two hundred and seventy-four consecutive Sundays. Mr. C. H. Heed, superintendent of the First English Lutheran Church Sunday School, sends us three good records: Miss Maggie Keely, present for three hundred and twelve Sabbaths without an absence, Miss Minnie Porter, who also has missed only four Sundays in eleven years, and Mr. Wilmot Beery, who is present every Sunday for ten years without a break.

Floods Bring Death and Destruction. Western Rivers Overflow Their Banks and Cause General Disaster.

GREAT floods, accompanied by loss of life and the destruction of a vast amount of property, are reported from many points in the West and Southwest. Unusually copious spring combined with the mild weather, swollen the Tennessee and Arkansas rivers, the Missouri, the Ohio and

THE MISSISSIPPI AT ST. LOUIS IN FLOOD.

Mississippi, to such an extent that have inundated the fertile valleys and lands for many miles on both sides these great waterways. Great loss of life and property is reported by the Mississippi overflow, is reported above and below Memphis. A stream country from nearly twenty miles to a point fifty miles south of that city submerged to a depth of from four feet, and the loss of crops, live stock property in the Tennessee and Arkansas valleys is said to have been far greater than in any previous floods. The Mississippi levees were patrolled by guards to prevent the embankments being cut by reckless people, who, to their own property from inundation, not hesitate to involve others in ruin.

It is impossible, until the waters subside to even estimate the extent of the damage. Seventeen lives were reported lost at point below Caruthersville, Mo. Six hundred persons were rescued from drowning and brought to Memphis, and on No. 10, a hundred persons and many more were surrounded by water for twenty hours, being finally rescued with difficulty. Five hundred flood fugitives narrowly escaped drowning in Dyer and Obion counties, Tenn. At Gavin, Ark., the country was flooded and the Iron Mountain road track was under water. A number of lives were lost in that section.

At many railroad depots along the Missouri and Mississippi, great piles of household goods were gathered in hope of saving them from destruction. Flocks of hogs and cows, sheds and other houses were sweeping down in increasing quantities. Near Cairo, Mo., a large area of wheat land was flooded, several days of heavy rain during the rivers continued to rise, being swollen by the melted snows, the floods subsided somewhat, and the greatest danger was for the moment averted. Rescued parties on steamers and all sorts of boats went out searching for those who were still in dangerous positions. The government permitted the use of several vessels for assisting the relief work they did good service in the Mississippi valley, saving life and property. So the searching steamers sailed among the treetops, taking off from roofs and uncovered points of many hundreds of fugitives who, having lost all their property, were thankful to escape with their lives. It is estimated that a section as large as the entire state of Missouri, was under water for a time.

This latest flood calamity is causing much suffering in Iowa, Tennessee, Missouri, Arkansas and Kentucky. Missouri and Arkansas being the worst sufferers. It is hoped, however, now the worst is over, that the receding waters may not disclose so great a destruction of human life as was originally feared.

BEHAVIOR IN CHURCH.

BOD behavior in church is just as important as good behavior anywhere else. And part of it begins at the very beginning in being in church a little while before the service commences. In our home in my childhood, at worship, my father had a way of remembering as pleasantly in conversation the hurrying methods of to-day, doing everything with a margin, so that nobody could be late. He insisted that young people of the house should come to prayers if they were well. Himself, Bible in hand, would be five minutes before the appointed time for us all to come. I can see now, across the years, his grey hair back from his serene face, his face lit with a rare inner smile, his expression the greatest patience. He would compose my mind, he would prepare me to enter the presence of the hear him softly crooning his favorite hymn, if I lean back in my chair and let it be as if the voice which sang the psalms had not been for many long years singing with the Redeemer above:

How happy are they,
Who the Saviour obey,
And have laid up their treasure above,
Oh, what tongue can express
The sweet comfort and peace
A soul in its earliest love.

If the unwritten laws always observed in this good man's home, was that he should be tardy in church. The things to me still. It is my delight to find my pew some minutes before the service begins his voluntary, and I am ashamed and humiliated, if ever by accident so late, that I must walk down the aisle after the pastor has inaugurated service. It seems to me as impolite to be at church, as to be late at any other function which has a fixed hour for besides it is really unnecessary. The untidy, tardy person usually catches the eye. If this is important in his day's engagements, and the train labelled, "Disruptive service, half-past ten o'clock," can be easily caught if one chooses to take the matter.

He that the thoroughly well-bred person will be well-behaved in church. He will sit still, without fidgeting or whispering. He will not whisper, she will not whisper. Neither will comment on the people who come to church, neither will make casual engagements while service is in progress. Above all things, no decently raised person will read printed calendars, turn over leaflets, or pull letters from his pocket or fumble through the hymn-book, while the commandments, or Scripture lessons are being read. I see in well-dressed and intelligent people doing such things, and they were considered impoliteness and lack of training in the actions.

Nothing improper of all, no one can claim to good breeding will pull out a watch and consult it while the minister is preaching. I can think of no violation of good taste and good manners. While the minister is preaching, his sermon be long or short we should be there before him, are in duty bound to give him courteous attention. We should be first in looking at him, see him restraining our thoughts from wandering, insubduing the outward manifestations of any impatience.

During service, our dress should not be changed. Our thoughts, Overcoats and wraps should be resumed after the benediction, not during the doxology. If we are arrayed in the children for the street, we wait till the service is over.

Observe that many persons coming into the church, drop their heads upon their hands, their private devotions, with no reference to what is going on at the moment. This does not seem to me quite right. A better way is to unite in what ever part of the service is in progress, one's own little prayer being supposed to anticipate the entire worship, not to interrupt itself on the worship which is appointed.

About the behavior of little children, I am sure that we must not be too rigid. They ought to go to church, but for them there may be indulgence, and the sensible mother will allow them a picture-book or a pad and pencil, or put her kind arm around the child and let the little head rest on her lap till the blessed baby is asleep. A child's sleep is no disturbance in the sanctuary. By all means let us have the dear little heads in the pew, and let the children early form the habit of going to church.

I joyed when to the house of God,
Go up, they said to me,
Jerusalem, within thy gates,
Our feet shall stand before thee.

"If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, may my right hand forget its cunning! I had rather be a doorkeeper in the house of the Lord, than to dwell in the tents of iniquity."

This is the heart's cry of the generations which are brought up to serve the King in his sacred courts.

SLUGGARDS' VINEYARDS.

SIt is a vivid picture that the wise man paints in Prov. 24: 30-34 of the vineyard of the sluggard. The desolation, the unproductiveness, and the untidiness are portrayed with the skill of an artist.

We see the broken wall, the weeds and nettles growing rank within. No benefit is it to the owner and it is an eye-sore to the passer-by. The wise man says he considered it well and he puts his finger on the cause. "A little slumber, a little more of the folding of the hands in sleep." The man is self-indulgent. He loves rest and quiet and has lost the energy and the power of overcoming inertia. That accounts for the condition of his garden. Not that sleep is wrong or blamable. A man must sleep in order to keep up his strength. But it is the man who wakes after sufficient rest and turns back to sleep in sheer idleness, that he blames. He is the man whose poverty comes upon him as an armed man. The disposition is not unknown after this lapse of time. The sluggard is frequently represented among us still. He is the man who neglects his duty whatever it may be and he is just as culpable whatever may be the neglected sphere. The habit of postponing effort, of putting off work until the morrow, which never comes, shows itself in all walks of life and needs to be watched against with ceaseless vigilance. One of the happiest and most successful of men gave this as the rule for a long, useful, and happy life: "Not to fret and to be well forward with your work." He said it had been his rule through life and he had appreciated its value at a higher rate with every year that passed. It is simply the power of overcoming inertia, the control of the body, the prompt performance of duty, all of which may be acquired by force of will and strong determination. These are necessary because our nature loves ease and rest and will not exert itself unless it is driven. Industry, energy, vigorous activity, mark the successful man, the man who whatsoever be his walk in life does his duty faithfully and conscientiously and reaps the reward.

Jerusalem Carriage Roads.

In a letter from Rev. John H. Sherrard, Pastor, Presbyterian Church, Thornton, Ind., the writer says: In a recent issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the statement was made that there were no good carriage-roads out from Jerusalem. When we visited Palestine, March, 1895, we found the best carriage-road, free from toll, all the twenty-five miles from Jerusalem to Hebron, I ever saw. It is wide, well graded and macadamized with limestone. There is also a good road for wheeled conveyances the eleven miles from Jerusalem to the Good Samaritan Inn, though carriages do run all the way to the Jordan.

SOWING AND REAPING.

Gradually, as scientific habits of observation have been cultivated, the world has discovered how much more of law there is in creation than had been suspected. It is not many generations back that the thunder was believed to be God's voice, and famines and pestilences the effects of his anger. Almost all phenomena were attributed to God's direct action. But more careful study and a more painstaking comparison of records, have led to the discovery of natural causes for the effects which were formerly deemed supernatural and as the clue was pursued, law was found everywhere. God was seen to be interfering far less frequently in his creation than was imagined, and order and regularity were found to be pervading all nature. Prof. Drummond took a step farther still and showed how law also governed the spiritual world. But this advance, slowly and painfully attained did not carry religious thought any further than the great Apostle had reached eighteen centuries before. In this sixth chapter of his epistle to his converts at Galatia on which the topic is based, he had distinctly stated that the law of sowing and reaping obtained in the spiritual world. He taught his readers that the punishment of sin was no arbitrary infliction, but the direct consequence of sin. Observation has simply confirmed revelation. The separation of man from God was perceived to be no penal enactment, but a necessity resulting from sin. Indulgence in sin produced physical and spiritual results which cannot be avoided, and moral deterioration in the end. The penal consequences of sin God could remit, and for Christ's sake would remit, but God did not protect any one from the consequence of wrong-doing. If a man lived to gratify his lower nature he could not escape becoming sensual and degraded. As the Apostle had said: "He that soweth to the flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption." So the discovery was made that sin is always loss and detriment, a great wrong to the interests of the sinner himself. Though his sin may be forgiven in the infinite mercy of God, the sinner must inevitably suffer, and having sown, must reap.

Thin, Pale Children

One satisfaction in giving Scott's Emulsion to children is they never object to it. The fact is, they soon become fond of it. Another satisfaction is because it will make them plump, and give them growth and prosperity. It should be given to all children who are too thin, or too pale. It does not make them over-fat, but plump.

It strengthens the digestive organs and the nerves, and furnishes material for rich blood.

Armenian Relief Work.

Cheering Reports of Missionaries — Orphan Rescue Work Progressing.

WITH the passing of the present winter—the second since the great Armenian massacres—the prospects in that long-oppressed country seem to be improving. Rev. Americus Fuller of Aintab Mission Station, writes us as follows:

Our field (Aintab station) of the Central Turkey Mission, includes the cities of Oorfa, Severeck, Adiaman, Behisin, Biridjik, Antioch, Scanderoon, and Aintab, has suffered most severely at Adiaman, Severeck, Oorfa, Biridjik, and Aintab. In all this field we are now getting through the winter with less desperate suffering than we feared, thanks to the timely and generous aid that you and others have sent. So far as the great mass of Armenians who remain is concerned, their need will depend largely on the course of events. With a fair chance and no extra oppression, they would get on, but the widows and orphans, of whom there must be three thousand or four thousand here with very scanty means of support, are a class for whom aid must be continued, or there will be starvation. My associate is now visiting the eastern part of our field, and making a careful examination of the needs of the people and on his return we will inform you of the facts as far as they are known.

Thanking you and your co-workers again most cordially for this assistance and joining you in the fervent hope and prayer that these terrible sufferings and wrongs may soon come to an end, I am, etc.

Mrs. Mary E. Barnum, one of the American missionaries in charge of the Harpoot Orphanage, writes:

I have often wished we could send you a picture of some of the orphans, as they have come to us in their filthy, tattered garments, with unkempt hair, and then another picture of them after they have returned from the bath, dressed in their clean new clothes. The transformation is often so great that one can scarcely recognize them. It is a great joy to see the happy faces of the children in the various homes. One little girl had been rescued after several efforts, from a Turkish family, where she had been kept since the massacre, and she had forgotten how to speak Armenian, though she understood what was said to her. In a few days, however, it came back to her, and now she does not wish to be addressed in Turkish. A few weeks after she came to the Home we received a poor girl who, with her grand-mother, was wandering about, sleeping in stables or wherever they could find a place, and begging their daily bread. It was cold, but the girl had on only two cotton garments and her feet were bare. Great was the joy of these girls when they met in the Girls' Home that evening, for they were step-sisters.

The other day four children appeared at the door, from a village a few hours distant. Their mother had been killed and the father died "from fear." The oldest girl, thirteen or fourteen years old, had bravely struggled to keep the children together and provide for them, but in vain. We put the two girls and their little four year old brother in one of the Girls' Homes, and the other brother in the Boys' Home No. 2.

In one of our Homes is a little boy five or six years old, rescued the other day with much difficulty from the Turks. He, too, had forgotten his Armenian and his friends besides. He cried lustily when brought to our house. His older brother, Mugerlich, also rescued from Turks, was already in the Home, laid up with a broken bone, but little Hickore would have nothing to say to him, but threw himself on the floor and screamed. We have now four Homes in the city. Two are already full, having in them thirty-one boys and thirty girls. The other two are rapidly filling up, and we have fifty-eight children in private families. The whole number in the city under our care is one hundred and fifty, of whom about seventy-one are girls and seventy-nine are boys. We do not know what the future of these orphans will be. We cannot plan for them now, but we go trustfully on day by day. We are using the money with care so as to help the greatest number without incurring debt. Some of them come to us from villages which we never heard of before. They are very ignorant and know little or nothing of Christianity. They are delighted to be here and to go to school. Only a few can read at present. They all come to Sunday School, and attend the Protestant services. In Mezereh, the seat of government, an hour distant, we have two other Homes, where about sixty children are gathered, and in other towns and villages of this field three hundred and fifty more are being cared for. At present we receive only those whose parents are both dead.

Fed by Faith.

In the experience of a poor Mexican tamale seller of Dallas, Tex., named Leno, who died recently there, was one episode which showed the strong Christian faith of the man, and its results. Leno was an ignorant, unlettered Mexican, prostrated by disease and suffering. His only shelter was a tent, whose ragged canvass afforded him little or no protection from the weather; his sole companions were a wretched, drunken wife, who would leave him for days together without food or water, and a faithful old dog, whose constancy should have been a mute reproach to the inhuman woman who neglected and ill-treated him. Yet, even here, under such conditions, Leno found Christ, or, rather, Christ found him. Accidentally his case of distress was made known to some ladies, who ministered to his temporal wants, and were rejoiced to hear him always, in his broken English, give God thanks for every kindness he received. One day, in recounting to these friends his sufferings before they came to his relief, he said that when left alone for days at a time he would pray for food, and that more than once the old dog went off and returned with a large piece of meat in his mouth. Said he: "Me so hungry, me eat it and tank de Lord."

He had never been taught to read even his own language, but was made happy by the gift of an English Bible, and would ask every one who came to his tent to read to him. His testimony was always, "Me ready; me glad to go." Circumstances at last compelled his removal to the county poor house, where he met and conquered the last enemy, and is, we doubt not, no longer "poor Leno," but "rich Leno," rich in Christ's fulfilled promises.

The Waverley Bicycle

$100 $60

The Waverley Bicycle for 1897 is the acme of bicycle construction. New and expensive principles of construction involved make the cost of building enormous. Hence the price is $100.

The only bicycle with true bearings

Last year the Waverley was as good as any wheel in the market—better than most. Because new machinery was not needed for its continued construction, the price of the improved 1896 model has been reduced to $60—a saving of $25 to you. Catalogue Free.

Owing to the wording of advertisement and a reference therein to "Titus" and "The Wrestler of Phil" some have been led to suppose that we were looking for MSS. of these characters and embracing New Testament History. This is a mistake. It should be a modern religious story. The widest liberty is allowed writers as to plot. It must be a boys and girls will read, and one that help them to understand and enter a companionship with Jesus.

HEROIC PERSONALITIES

BY REV. LOUIS ALBERT BANKS, D.D.

Heroic Business Career.

THE forty years ago a young man began his life-work in the City of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., as a confectioner. His mother was a widow, and he had very small capital to work on, but a brave-hearted youth and set him to work with courage and good will.

HON. WM. W. SMITH.

He would make his candy himself, and with his basket on his arm make the rounds of the stores, and any private houses where candy had been ordered. He derived from the first that his candy would always be the very best he could make. He was scrupulously clean. Although his clothes were plain, his linen and long white aprons were white as snow. One day a gentleman complimented him on the fact of his always being neat and clean about his person and business. The boy flushed with pleasure under the compliment, but answered with pride that spoke volumes for his devotion, "That, sir, is the work of my mother."

The outward cleanliness of this youth was a suggestion of the inward purity and wholesomeness of his strong soul. He early became a sincere Christian, and made a solemn determination that no matter what was the result, he would live up to his Christianity in all his business engagements of his life, and he gave a vow that if the time ever came when he either had to lose business or sacrifice his Christian principle, it would be his business and not his Christianity that should suffer.

A trying time came soon enough. One of his friends, who was also one of the best young men in the community, and a customer he had, came to his shop and ordered ten pounds of brandy candies. The young confectioner did not like the order, but he ordered them from New York by express. Before they came, however, his conscience began to trouble him. Was he doing right in having a hand in selling these brandy candies? He remembered the young man who had ordered them would give them out among the young men and the young women of the neighborhood, and the result might be more than one would get their state of intoxicating drink in that city. No one could tell what sad result would come of it. On the other hand, if he refused to accommodate his customer, he would no doubt lose his friendship and trade, and only drive him to some one else who would procure them for him. He could not sleep that night about it, and more he thought about it, the more he was thoroughly convinced he became that it was not a Christian thing to do, to in any way have part in putting temptation in the way of another. Having come to this conclusion, he acted with promptness and firmness. When the brandy candies came he immediately expressed his objection to the wholesale firm in New York, and when the young man came to collect after them he frankly told him what he had done and why. As he expected, the young man was very angry, and was full of contempt for him on account of what he called his "fanatical notions."

That was the parting of the ways for these two young men. The poor young confectioner that stood by his principles has grown to be a wealthy and honored citizen, while the rich young tippler has long since gone to a dishonored grave, eaten up by his sinful lusts and appetites, as Herod was eaten of worms.

Our young hero maintained the same attitude as his business enlarged and broadened. He became after awhile a caterer, and on his business cards, through all the years, he has kept the plain and simple statement that not only would no wines and liquors be furnished by him, but he will not permit his servants to serve at a feast or dinner where they are used. He has many times lost hundreds and thousands of dollars by this fidelity to principle, but it has never tempted him to swerve for a moment, and perhaps in the long run he has gained by it, even financially. His splendid fidelity to principle has been a great object lesson for good to all who have known him, and has helped by example and influence to banish the punch bowl and the wine glass from many a wedding-feast and public dinner in that part of the country.

When the great Poughkeepsie railroad bridge was nearing completion a big dinner was given to the railroad men of the country at that place. Our friend, as the leading caterer of the region, was secured for the occasion. But as the time drew near and he found they intended to use wines, he refused absolutely to have anything to do with it, and so steadfastly did he abide by his purpose, that the wines were banished.

Who can tell how wide the influence for good such a business man spreads through the community. Like Peter's healing shadow on whomsoever the influence of such a man falls, its effect is to strengthen him in purity and righteousness of life. All honor to Hon. William W. Smith, the heroic business man of Poughkeepsie!

Sixteen Hours Under Water.

Corsetto, an Italian inventor, has constructed an apparatus which he calls a "methydric square," and by means of which he professes to be able to descend to any depth of the sea. In an experiment at Spezzia he stored some two thousand cubic feet of compressed air in his apparatus, which he entered with two friends, and which was then lowered to a depth of thirty feet. As after the expiration of nine hours the sphere had not re-ascended to the surface, a diver was sent to the spot. The sphere was found still resting on the sea bottom, but the diver heard nothing in answer to his knocks. It was raised with ropes, and as soon as it emerged its door was opened, and the inventor appeared with a livid face and half asphyxiated. His companions were unconscious, but were quickly resuscitated. They had remained sixteen hours under water. The inventor explains that the air pressure proved insufficient to expel the water ballast. Three persons were enabled to remain under water for sixteen hours, and this experiment may not be without significance as regards the much-discussed problem of submarine navigation.

Little Baby Pak Dead.

The First Korean Child Born in America Dies in New York City—A Touching History.

There is sorrow in one very humble home in New York City. Baby Pak, the first Korean baby ever born in this country, passed away from earth on March 14. He was taken with pneumonia ten days before and never rallied. Mamma Pak, the young Korean matron, was with her child to the last. Baby Pak was the daughter of Dr. Kim Pak and Miss Esther Kim Pak, his wife, two worthy young Korean Christians who had been converted in the late Dr. Hall's mission at Pyeng Yeng, Corea. Mrs. Pak came to the United States about two years ago, for the purpose of studying at the Woman's Medical College, Baltimore. Baby Pak was born February 21, 1896, and she soon became a prime favorite with the doctors and students of the Nursery and Child's Hospital in New York, where she received the kindest care and most loving attention in her early infancy. Many who visited THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home at Mont-Lawn, Nyack-on-the-Hudson, last summer, will remember seeing the happy-faced mother and her chubby little laughing baby looking out on the lawn, across which the merry troops of tenement children were scampering and romping in play. The two were under the guardianship of Dr. Rose H. S. Hall, who was the resident physician of the Home that season, and who is now at the head of the Woman's Medical Training School in New York. Mrs. Pak will continue her studies at the Baltimore College for the next three years, and will then return as a medical missionary to her own country where such workers are greatly needed.

MRS. PAK AND BABY PAK.

necessity to do so, and loafed about the town, a common nuisance.

A few days after the new minister came to the town he met the old sinner on the village street, and bowing, spoke a pleasant "Good morning," and passed on his way. The old man turned and looked after him, and made inquiry of some as to who it might be who showed him such an unaccustomed attention. The same thing happened a day or two afterward, and again during the space of a week or two. Some one told the minister that he had made a friend of old —, and laughingly told him that he was wasting his politeness on that old reprobate, whose acquaintance was not desirable.

"You don't know him," said this person, "or you wouldn't speak to him at all." "Never mind," said the minister, "it does not cost much to be polite, and no more to an old reprobate than to the 'squire' of the town." It was not long till old — was noticed creeping into the corner of the church farthest from the pulpit and nearest to the door. He had come in late and was the first to leave the church. He came again and again, and was finally brought to Christ, and during the rest of his life he lived a consistent and earnest Christian life. He said the minister's bow was what had started him on the upward path.

An Electrical Windmill.

The first attempt to utilize a windmill as an electrical generator has just been successfully made by a resident of Walpole, Mass., Mr. J. J. Feely. His windmill is of the ordinary kind, but the dynamo is an invention of Mr. Feely, by which the variation of electric pressure, from the fluctuation of the wind, is so equalized that the surplus of electric energy generated in time of high wind is accumulated in storage batteries for use when the wind is low. The whole affair works automatically and perfectly. By it Mr. Feely lights his house, stables and grounds, forces water all over his estate, operates farm machinery, cuts wood, etc. The possibilities of the invention are almost limitless.

Evangelists Gillam and Estey are holding services at Braintree, Mass. Their mission at Marlboro, N. H., led to an extensive revival in which the Methodist and Congregational churches united.

with which those Poor Half Heathen Heard the Story of Jesus.

Letter to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from Sapporo, Japan. Rev. John Batchelor gives this interesting description of a year's work among the strange people known as the Ainu:
I work both among the Ainu and among the Japanese. The work has grown so big and the extent of territory covered is so large, that the mission has at last been divided into four parts for each of the four Presbyteries now working here. In my own presbytery alone 10,000 Ainu reside: 681 have been received into the Church of Christ, of whom there are now 667 members, and of whom 97 were baptized this year, and of whom 139 are at present under instruction. The Japanese in my district 12 have been baptized this year, and the number of Christians from among this people present under my care is 113 besides whom there are 42 being instructed in Christianity. Thus in my presbytery the Christians, Japanese, and the number 781, and those seeking baptism 181.

It is not to be doubted that the Ainu is a different race, besides non-Christians, than twelve church members have been taken from us this year. One of these was a student and helper, preparing to become a preacher to his own people. The object of this aboriginal race has been the word of God, the message of the Gospel, and is being saved. The eager people to hear the Gospel has been well sustained throughout the year.

During the months of June and July, Rev. Batchelor itinerated among the Ainu in the Utsu and Saru districts. Meetings were held every evening in different villages, and in many instances the message was proclaimed to a crowded assembly. Thirteen Ainu were baptized and thirty-three were received as members, as well as four Japanese. On the trip it was at times found difficult to get any rest, as this inclement weather: One evening a prayer meeting was held at nine P. M., at which time the Ainu were present. As soon as it was over preparations were made for rest, but just at ten o'clock a party of Ainu presented themselves for the meeting. As they had come from a neighboring village, there was nothing for it but to stay and hold a second meeting. This being over, rest was again about, but not yet, for another party of nine appeared on the scene at ten P. M., and a third meeting had to be held to satisfy them. Ultimately, rest came at midnight.

There has been one remarkable conversion, a Japanese school master in my presbytery this year which reminds me forcibly of the story of the blind men. He was brought to the knowledge of his sins by the simple teaching of the New Testament, and he came to the Saviour, where he found rest by prayer and study of the Word. He was a staunch Buddhist, he had no sin and was set against Christianity. After having found pardon he gave up his former life and came as a candidate for baptism. He was baptised a few weeks ago in the church at Piratori, having more than twelve miles for that journey. Before his baptism his wife did not wish to keep him from taking that journey, and when she found he was firm in his convictions and could not be moved in his determination, she asked him to decide! Through his tears and prayers the master graciously touched his heart, and he is now anxious for baptism. The inhabitants of the village in which he resides called a large meeting at that time since in order to see what they could do to stop Christianity from taking the headway it is apparently doing there! The meeting came to the conclusion that they must get rid of the village priest who has not much to say and employ a better and more useful man in his place! This again shows the power of Christianity. But how foolish this people to imagine that it is by their own efforts which accomplishes such wonderful things. If they come to fight the Gospel which contains the truth of God with their weapons of so-called learning, we know which must triumph.

A sick woman came to us last year, and while with us had not only her bodily ailments cured by the doctor, but also found peace in her soul through the preaching of the Word. While in the interior this year, this woman, aged between forty and fifty, came in eight miles to service on two succeeding Sundays, both of which were very wet and windy. On both occasions, she remembered the offertory, and on the first also brought us a fine salmon as a present. On the last Sunday, she partook of the Lord's Supper with us. Her little granddaughter who is ill, is now with us, being attended by the doctor. Those persons who believe the Gospel and are baptized, are not ashamed of showing their colors. We had a young girl with us early this year suffering from consumption. At the end of a few months she was sent home as incurable. In the autumn my wife and I were passing through her village when she peeped out of the hut and begged us to stay there that night and preach. Moreover, she said she had been telling her friend of Jesus and that she desired to present her to me for baptism as she also now believed! Her aunt also came out and she, too, wanted us to spend the night with them. Strange to say, this village is one of the very few whose inhabitants have hitherto been afraid of Christianity.

Lost Appetite.
COULD NOT EAT THE MOST TEMPTING DISHES.
Many Days Without any Food at all — Can Eat Four Square Meals a Day Now — The Cause of the Change.

From the Leader, Cleveland, Ohio.

For the restoration of an appetite which has been impaired or lost through sickness, no remedy can compare in effectiveness with Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People. This statement is substantiated by the experience and declarations of men and women with whom these pills have become a household medicine. Among the many who can offer testimony to this particular property of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills is George Marshall, Jr., who lives at No. 19 Norwich Street, Cleveland, Ohio. Mr. Marshall is a news agent on the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern Railroad, and his territory extends from Cleveland to Toledo. Like thousands of others who owe their health and vigor to Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, Mr. Marshall never hesitates to sing their praises. In his case it was necessary to use only a few boxes of the pills to restore him to the full possession of bodily health. His digestive organs had become almost useless through a long and serious illness, but in a surprisingly brief period, through the agency of this wonderful medicine, they were capable of again performing their functions in a regular and perfectly satisfactory manner. In narrating his experience with them Mr. Marshall said:
"Last spring I was taken sick with inflammatory rheumatism, and my entire system was affected. To relieve the suffering it was necessary to paint me with iodine. After three months' treatment, I became convalescent, but the attack had sapped my strength and left me extremely weak and feeble. I could scarcely lift an arm or a leg. This weakness permeated my entire system, and applied as well to my stomach and digestive apparatus as to my limbs. I soon discovered that I had lost my appetite almost as completely as though I never had one. I had no desire whatever to partake of any nourishment, and the natural result was that my convalescence was extremely slow, and my parents feared that I was going to suffer a relapse or fall prey to another ailment on account of my debilitated condition.
"Many a day I would not take any nourishment, and whenever I did the quantity was too insignificant to materially hasten my improvement. Tempting dishes were prepared for me, but I could not touch them. I began to become more or less alarmed as did my parents, and one day my mother suggested the purchase of some of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for me. They had been recommended to her by a neighbor who regarded them as nothing short of miraculous, and dwelt so enthusiastically on their excellent qualities that mother persuaded me to try them. There is not much more to tell now, for I don't look like a man who cannot eat three or four square meals a day, do I?
"Three boxes of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills fixed me up sound as a dollar, and they will do the same for anyone else, I am sure. It was not long after I began to use the pills that I could feel myself improving. My strength began to return and so did my appetite, and I was on the road again in a short time. That is my experience, and I am glad to give it for the benefit of others who may have lost their appetites through sickness."
Dr. Williams' Pink Pills contain all the elements necessary to give new life and richness to the blood and restore shattered nerves. They are for sale by all druggists, or may be had by mail, from Dr. Williams' Medicine Company, Schenectady, N. Y., for 50c. per box, or six boxes for $2.50.

Description of The World-Wide Encyclopedia.

The World-Wide Encyclopedia answers every question, however difficult or abstruse. A digest of all knowledge from the earliest times is contained within its pages, and no person, however untutored, provided he can read, need lack for full information on any subject within the scope of human knowledge, when once he is the possessor of this work of universal interest.

The World-Wide Encyclopedia is an epitome of the "sum total of wisdom and knowledge." It treats fully and exhaustively of every subject of human interest, whether history, science, theology, botany, mythology, travel, biography, classics, physiology, etc., etc., from the beginning of things down to the practical questions of our own day. It is a fountain of knowledge on all subjects, and contains more compact wisdom than was ever stored in the brain of the greatest sage on earth.

The World-Wide Encyclopedia contains nearly seven thousand large pages, and 96 colored plates. The Encyclopedia consists of 15 large volumes, and these are handsomely and durably bound in rich silk-finish lined cloth, and stamped in solid gold. Each volume is 9 inches long, 6 3/4 inches wide, and 1 1/2 inches thick. The 15 volumes when on the book shelf make a striking array nearly two feet in length. The set weighs about 30 pounds, and not many years ago it would have taken $200 to buy it, but this is the day of labor-saving machinery enterprise and low prices.

Reader, Ia. Where the heads of a family profess to be Christians, yet have practiced all their lives reading the Bible only on Sundays, while through the week, from early morning till late at night, their time is taken up with secular matters, having no patience with anyone who thinks or does differently, what is your advice to one who, since his connection with the Church, has lived in the city and has enjoyed the best of church privileges, besides attending Sunday School, Endeavor meetings, weekly prayer meetings, Bible readings, lectures, etc., but on account of his duty to his parents, is called home where there are scarcely any religious services of any kind? He feels that if he is compelled to remove he will lose his communion and be overcome by former habits of life, if he has not already done so.

An earnest Christian, so situated, is in the right place to do missionary work. He should earthly glory in this work, and the record of eternity alone will give the results. Our oldest convict, eighty-four years of age, died a few days since. Eighteen years ago he confessed Christ, since which his life has been a glorious illustration of the grace of God to save to the uttermost.

A. M. McPHEETERS.

The letter referred to is as follows:

STATE PRISON, RALEIGH, N. C., March 13.
EDITOR CHRISTIAN HERALD.—DEAR SIR: While reading your paper we have seen the account of the great and intense suffering of the starving thousands in India, and our hearts go out in sympathy for them. We only regret that we are not able to do more for their relief. We are prisoners in the above-named place, and our chances are very poor to make money, as our earnings are very small; but with cheerful hearts we cast in our little mites, asking the good Lord to direct it as a blessing to the starving people of India. R. P. Willis, James Thomas, Lee Bailey, T. L. C., W. D. Eanes, H. C. Zecrest, Uriah Bell, A. J. Halford, W. H. Brantley, J. T. B., N. M. Moore, J. M. Hargett.

Geo. E. Downes, Francetown, N. H. It seems to me it would be well for our people to send corn from this country to India, since it is so plentiful.

Subscriber, Gardner, Mass. When our western farmers proposed sending shiploads of grain to the starving people of India it was objected to. Will you please tell me how the missionaries are able to purchase supplies in that famine-scourged country?

Replying to both these letters, we would say: the missionaries have now called for corn, and the first American Relief ship, The City of Everett, is now loading with corn at San Francisco. See article on another page. By meat, fowls, fish, eggs, or birds are eaten, cheese is unknown. The only animal food of diet is milk, which is used as curd and ghi, the latter the equivalent of clarified butter. As all crops have failed, owing to long drought, the parched ground is green this year save in districts of artificial irrigation has supplied moisture.

Student, Birmingham, Ala. Where is the Bible in the world?

In the Vatican at Rome. It is in MS., and weighs 320 pounds. At one time it is said, 1,800,000 francs were offered for it.

Mrs. J. L., Madison, Ia. How many stations are there in the world?

Approximately 22,868, to which 6,355 and 5,219 men have been sent out by 141 missionary societies, making a total of 11,274. In addition there are 7,000 helpers in the field. The annual expense on the stations is $14,441,807. These are furnished from the statistics of the organizations and are liable to a change though not materially.

Myron A. T., Birchrun, Mich. 1. What standard authority on etiquette? 2. For two Christians who are strangers, another, to shake hands in church without introduced by some one?

1. Mrs. Sherwood is one of the best authorities. 2. There is nothing improper, and if they are spiritually drawn together, there is no reason why they should greet one another, even though uninitiated. Ordinarily, however, it is always safest to the advantage of an introduction.

Reader. What was the passage in the Bible when President McKinley kissed while taking the inaugural oath?

Is it understood that the passage is Chron. 1: 10: "Give me now wisdom and knowledge, that I may go out and cure this people; for who can judge a people that is so great?" This verse is cited on beforehand and when the President kissed the book, his lips touched a spot on the page where those lines appear.

W. F. B., Dupres-stone, Va. Please answer whether it is true that a letter has been written by Christ?

No; the so-called letter of Jesus is a monkish forgery, and was long ago exposed.

Jas. W. S., Clifton, O. I saw in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that the ruler of India did not send money and provisions to relieve famine sufferers. How could money be of greatest importance in such a famine?

Since that time, the scant supply of the country has gone up to famine prices; it is now absolutely necessary that corn be sent promptly and abundantly, if great life is to be averted.

Subscriber, Stratford, Ont. Does not the story in John 17: 15 that "The Jews marvelled how knoweth this man letters, having learned?" prove that Jesus was not a like other boys?

No, it proves that he did not have the theological education which public to usually received and such as Paul had. Gamaliel, but no Jew would allow his son to grow up wholly untaught. You may be sure that he who was made in all things like unto his brethren, did not neglect labor and effort necessary to an education.

MOUNT SHASTA, AS SEEN FROM THE SCOTT MOUNTAINS, CALIFORNIA.

This view of the famous giant peak is one of the grandest scenes to be found in any land. Seen from the sides of the Scott range, the solitary Shasta rises to its magnificent height of 14,440 feet. Although Mount Whitney surpasses Shasta somewhat in altitude, the latter is the more picturesque, as it stands separate and alone, save for a low ridge of mountains, while Whitney lies amid a chain of peaks almost equal to itself in height. Shasta is of volcanic origin, as indeed are probably all the California mountains, and at one time its height may have been greater than now. Intervals, believed by scientists to have been not less than a thousand years, have occurred between the periods of intense volcanic agitation and the condition of quiescence.

Among the many kind and sympathetic letters that are daily reaching us, since the India Famine Relief Fund was opened, there are few that speak more eloquently than this:

RALEIGH, N. C., March 13, 1897.

When at our regular Sunday School service yesterday at the State penitentiary, I received from my class the enclosed letter and the amount for which I enclose you a P. O. for $2.75. This letter will exonerate itself. I am much gratified at the spirit that prompted this small gift. This school was commenced on the first Sunday in July, 1877, more than twenty years ago. Sympathizer, Waltham, Mass. Is there no other article of food that these starving people of India can get, such as meat, vegetables, fruits, etc? Does grain alone form their diet at all times? Can you tell me also how they prepare the grain given them?

The Hindu abhors meat, and lives directly upon the products of the soil. The lamb eat a grain like millet, called jowberry and bajra, the Brahmins eat wheat, flour and rice with dal and pulse. Corn, millet cakes, boiled leaves, fruit, mango, plantain and cocoanut—these are the staple diet of millions. No

ACROSS THE SEAS TO FREEDOM.

The tide of Old World Immigration to these Shores — Among the Arrivals at Ellis Island — Will Immigration be Restricted?

FOR upwards of a quarter of a century, the tide of emigration from the Old World to these shores has been steadily increasing. Nearly thirty years ago, the influx from the British Islands continued, in growing volume. In the last fifteen years, during which time tens of thousands of Queen Victoria's subjects became domiciled in this country, the Irish constituting the bulk of the immigrants. Then came the German, which in turn was followed by the Russian, the latter element when the tide was at its height, exceeding in volume that of the preceding years. In the last few years our immigration statistics show a great variety of races landing at our ports. Vast numbers of Russian, Polish, Hebrews have crossed the ocean to become citizens of Freedom's land. While Danes, Swedes, Hungarians, Cubans, Spaniards, Arabs, Syrians, and last of all, Armenians, in turn, are flocking to the immigration, all who could be classed as "desirable immigrants" were welcomed, it was the laxity of our American laws such that a considerable number could not be so regarded took opportunity to place themselves under the protection of the Stars and Stripes. Many who had belonged to the pauper classes abroad, and a few who have been offenders against the laws of their own country, came hither, thus bringing to these shores an element whose presence boded ill for the future of the community in which they might dwell. On the other hand, it was not that many came to avoid political and religious persecution, as was undoubtedly the case with the Russian, Jews and the Armenians of Anatolia, with whose privations in their own land our people are already acquainted. Special attention has lately been directed to the growing necessity of stringent immigration laws for the purpose of excluding undesirable elements to our population. With the rapid growth of the population through the port of New York alone, being about one-half of the total number arriving at all our ports of entry. This vast number represented nearly every nationality under the sun. Only a few thousand were refused admission under the existing law, which excludes paupers and the physically and mentally disabled and contract laborers. These immigrants are required to satisfactorily answer a series of questions as to name, age, married or single, occupation, nationality, ability to read or write, final destination, whether assisted or otherwise, and as to the amount of money each immigrant possesses. He is also interrogated concerning his previous record, whether he has been in jail or is a pauper or a polygamist. Great latitude has been exercised in conducting the examinations, as is sufficiently demonstrated by the comparatively small number of exclusions.

Our illustrations are of special interest at this season of the year, when the usual spring influx of immigration is beginning. It is not improbable that the number of arrivals may be even larger than usual this spring, in anticipation of the passage of restriction laws which may make entrance to our ports much more difficult hereafter. On the first page of this issue,

"runners," and swindlers of every sort lay in wait to rob, mislead, and victimize the simple. Now, these plunderers have been driven away and the entire surroundings of the immigrant are conducive to comfort and safety. Competent officers care for and direct him, all his baggage and valuables are looked after, skillful doctors attend him if sick, and there are missionaries, representing all the different denominations, who are at hand to afford spiritual advice and consolation. United States Commissioner Senner, Acting Commissioner McSweeney and staff have, on their little island in New York bay, an institution which is a model of its kind, and a visit to which cannot fail to be interesting and instructive.

TRANSFORMED BY GRACE.

The Remarkable Conversion of a New York Lawyer Who had Fallen to the Lowest Depths of Sin and Shame.

ONE of the most extraordinary cases of conversion—an experience which will prove helpful to many readers and encouraging to all—is related below. The facts are absolutely authentic.

In June, 1895, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD published an article descriptive of the Whosoever Gospel Mission and Rescue Home. When he "came to himself" and realized the wonderful mercy and forbearance of God, he cried to the Lord for pardon and surrendered fully to his will. The Lord heard and answered his cry and spoke peace to his soul. Understanding his own weakness and the impossibility of keeping from temptation, he prayed God to direct him to some place of refuge. In an almost miraculous way, the article in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD above referred to came to his notice. He had never read a copy of the paper before. Yet here, at the moment of his direst extremity, was the help he so much needed, as though in direct answer to prayer. On the 18th of June, 1895, he came to the Whosoever Gospel Mission and Rescue Home of Germantown and remained in the Home six months. After conversion he became convinced that he had a call to preach the gospel. He attended a leading theological seminary for a time and last summer began work in the West as an evangelist. He labored in the large cities of Illinois, Indiana and Kentucky and preaching in in every hand—a growth disproportionate to the normal expansion of our industries—there followed a congestion in the labor market which was very felt in the larger cities and manufacturing centres. But there was another element, separate and distinct from those enumerated, which it was desired to exclude. It was the criminal class—convicts and the lawless, who had rendered themselves obnoxious at home and were hardly likely, with the greater freedom they would enjoy here, to change their habits and mode of living in the new world. The movement in favor of restricted immigration took the form of local legislation, and a bill was introduced with a view to shutting out the criminal, the pauper and the physically incapable, as well as the illiterate. The proposed measure failed to become a law, but it is probable that the effort to restrict such a bill will be renewed at no distant date.

In the year 1896, over a quarter of a million of immigrants reached our shores the large colored illustration shows a familiar scene in the Main Hall, at Immigration Headquarters, Ellis Island, after the arrival of a steamer. Having been transferred from the steamship to the island boat, they are landed on the dock and quickly assigned to quarters in the large building, where all such new-comers are temporarily placed until they are disposed of either by being "passed," or "returned" to their port of embarkation. Sometimes over a thousand immigrants are gathered in this hall, and on very busy days, even double that number. Then there is the usual formal examination, at which the questions already referred to are put to the new-comer. Should the answers be satisfactory, the immigrant is forwarded to his or her destination without delay; if otherwise, there may be a slight detention, to await a more thorough inquiry by the Examining Board, which may direct that the immigrant be "passed" or "returned," according to circumstances.

Many precautions are now taken for the comfort and welfare of immigrants arriving at American ports, which were not thought of in former years. In the days when "Castle Garden" was the old immigrant depot at the Battery, the lower part of the city was full of dangers for the new-comers, and "land sharks," immigrant cue Home of Germantown, Pa. This article was the means, in God's hands, of reviving hope in the heart of a New York lawyer who was weary of sin, and on the verge of despair. He had, through strong drink, lost all, and become a castaway. He was born and educated in the city of New York, was a graduate of one of the leading universities, and was tenderly trained by Christian parents amid religious surroundings. He started life with the most brilliant prospects, and step by step went up the ladder of prosperity until he gained a large and lucrative practice.

He began to drink wine at dinner, and soon to take stimulants to revive his overwrought mind. The habit grew upon him imperceptibly until he became a drunkard. Whiskey had complete mastery over him. Aided by a loving wife and family, who made many sacrifices for him, and strove in every way to shield him from the ravages of the destroyer, he tried many times to reform. Property, friends, all that he had, soon were lost. For months at a time, he would not draw a sober breath. He was sin-cursed, and bound hand and foot by shackles that could not be broken. He became separated from his wife and family, and sank lower and lower into the depths of misery.

One day in June, 1895, while intoxicated and oblivious to everything around, he fell overboard into the river, was rescued, more dead than alive, and taken to the the villages and hamlets in the mountains, among the moonshiners, riding many hundreds of miles on horseback and carrying the "glad tidings" to those who had seldom heard the story of Jesus. Returning to Philadelphia, he has since been actively engaged in evangelistic work in that city and vicinity. God has blessed his labors and the poor drunkard has been the means in his hands of winning hundreds of souls to Christ.

The Whosoever Gospel Mission and Rescue Home has a unique and interesting history. This noble institution was founded by Mr. William Raws, its Superintendent, some five years ago. He and his assistant Mr. J. P. McIntyre, are both redeemed men. Some 8,000 men have passed through the Home since it was first opened, forty families have been re-united, six hundred men have obtained positions through its influence, and many hundreds of others have been helped both materially and spiritually.

Fruits of a Wayside Ministry.

REV. GEO. W. SHARP, our Sunday School missionary in the south-west, writes from Macon county, Missouri: "I am laboring for a time in a country church, nearly midway between two school-houses where, in former years, I organized Sunday Schools in places of moral destitution. The church house has since been erected and a large congregation of believers has been gathered. Their Sunday School is evergreen, they have preaching regularly, a flourishing Society of Young People's Christian Endeavor meets each Sunday evening, and a convert of one of the meetings held since the church was erected, has been attending a college to prepare himself for the Gospel ministry. Of the numerous converts of this community, one has an interesting personal history which shows the blessing of God upon wayside ministry. Several years ago I was riding on horseback through this part of the country, and overtook a young man traveling in the same direction. We journeyed together a few miles, and as on inquiry he did not know the Lord, I explained to him the Gospel message. We parted when the roads diverged, and I heard no more of him until after several months I received a message informing me he had become a Christian."

RUIN AND RESTORATION.

Sermon by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., Then went up in the night and viewed the wall, and turned back, and entered by the gate of the valley, and so returned.

DEAD city is more suggestive than a living city—past Rome than present Rome—ruins rather than newly frescoed cathedral. But the best time to visit a ruin is by moonlight. The Coliseum is far more fascinating to the traveler after sundown than before. You may stand by daylight amid the monastic ruins of Melrose Abbey, and study shafted oriel and rosetted stone and mullion, but they throw their strongest witchery by moonlight. Some of you remember what the chanter of Scotland said in the "Lay of the Last Minstrel":

Wouldst thou view fair Melrose aright,
Go visit it by the pale moonlight.

Washington Irving describes the Andalusian moonlight upon the Alhambra ruins as amounting to an enchantment. My text presents you Jerusalem in ruins. The tower down. The gates down. The walls down. Everything down. Nehemiah on horseback, by moonlight looking upon the ruins. While he rides, there are some friends on foot going with him, for they do not want the many horses to disturb the suspicions of the people. These people do not know the secret of Nehemiah's heart, but they are going as a sort of body-guard. I hear the clicking hoofs of the horse on which Nehemiah rides, as he guides it this way and that, into this gate and out of that, winding through that gate amid the debris of once great Jerusalem. Now the horse comes to dead halt at the tumbled masonry where he cannot pass. Now he shies off at the charred timbers. Now he comes along where the water under the moonlight flashes from the mouth of the brazen dragon after which the gate was named. Heavy-hearted Nehemiah! Riding in and out, now by his old home desolated, now by the defaced Temple, now amid the scars of the city that had gone down under battering-ram and conflagration. The escorting party knows not what Nehemiah means. Is he getting crazy? Have his own personal sorrows, added to the sorrows of the nation, unbalanced his intellect? Still the midnight exploration goes on. Nehemiah on horseback rides through the fish gate, by the tower of the furnaces, by the king's pool, by the dragon well, in and out, in and out, until the midnight ride is completed, and Nehemiah dismounts from his horse, and to the amazed and confounded and incredulous body-guard, declares the dead secret of his heart when he says: "Come, now, let us build Jerusalem." "What, Nehemiah, have you any money?" "No." "Have you any kingly authority?" "No." "Have you any eloquence?" "No." Yet that midnight, moonlight ride of Nehemiah resulted in the glorious rebuilding of the city of Jerusalem. The people knew not how the thing was to be done, but with great enthusiasm they cried out: "Let us rise up now and build the city." Some people laughed and it could not be done. Some people were infuriate and offered physical violence, saying the thing should not be done. But the workmen went right on, standing on the wall, trowel in one hand, sword in the other, until the work was gloriously completed. At that very time in Greece, Xenophon was writing a history, and Plato was making philosophy, and Demosthenes was rattling his rhetorical thunder; but all of them together did not do so much for the world as this midnight, moonlight ride of praying, courageous, homesick, close-mouthed Nehemiah.

My subject first impresses me with the idea what an intense thing is Church affection. Seize the bridle of that horse and stop Nehemiah. Why are you risking your life here in the night? Your horse will stumble over these ruins and fall on you. Stop this useless exposure of your life. No; Nehemiah will not stop. He at last tells us the whole story. He lets us know he was an exile in a far distant land, and he was a servant, a cup-bearer in the palace of Artaxerxes Longimanus, and one day, while he was handing the cup of wine to the king, the king said to him, "What is the matter with you? You are not sick. I know you must have some great trouble. What is the matter with you?" Then he told the king how that beloved Jerusalem was broken down; how that his father's tomb had been desecrated; how that the Temple had been dishonored and defaced; how that the walls were scattered and broken. "Well," says King Artaxerxes, "what do you want?" "Well," said the cup-bearer Nehemiah, "I want to go home. I want to fix up the grave of my father. I want to restore the beauty of the Temple. I want to rebuild the masonry of the city wall. Besides, I want passports so that I shall not be hindered in my journey. And besides that," as you will find in the context, "I want an order on the man who keeps your forest for just so much timber as I may need for the rebuilding of the city." "How long shall you be gone?" said the king. The time of absence is arranged. In hot haste this seeming adventurer comes to Jerusalem, and in my text we find him on horseback, in the midnight, riding around the ruins. It is through the spectacles of this scene that we discover the ardent attachment of Nehemiah for sacred Jerusalem, which in all ages has been the type of the Church of God, our Jerusalem, which we love just as much as Nehemiah loved his Jerusalem. The fact is that you love the Church of God so much that there is no spot on earth so sacred, unless it be your own fireside. The Church has been to you so much comfort and illumination that there is nothing that makes you so irate as to have it talked against. If there have been times when you have been carried into captivity by sickness, you longed for the Church, our holy Jerusalem, just as much as Nehemiah longed for his Jerusalem, and the first day you came out you came to the house of the Lord. When the temple was in ruins, like Nehemiah, you walked around and looked at it, and in the moonlight you stood listening if you could not hear the voice of the dead organ, the psalm of the expired Sabbaths. What Jerusalem was to Nehemiah, the Church of God is to you. Sceptics and infidels may scoff at the Church as an obsolete affair, as a relic of the dark ages, as a convention of goody-goody people, but all the impression they have ever made on your mind against the Church of God is absolutely nothing. You would make more sacrifices for it to-day than any other institution, and if it were needful you would die in its defence. You can take the words of the kingly poet as he said: "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning." You understand in your own experience the pathos, the home-sickness, the courage, the holy enthusiasm of Nehemiah in his midnight moonlight ride around the ruins of his beloved Jerusalem.

Again, my text impresses me with the fact that, before reconstruction, there must be an exploration of ruins. Why was not Nehemiah asleep under the covers? Why was not his horse stabled in the midnight? Let the police of the city arrest this midnight rider, out on some mischief. No. Nehemiah is going to rebuild the city, and he is making the preliminary exploration. In this gate, out that gate, east, west, north, south. All through the ruins. The ruins must be explored before the work of reconstruction can begin. The reason that so many people in this day, apparently converted, do not stay converted is because they did not first explore the ruins of their own heart. The reason that there are so many professed Christians who in this day lie and forge and steal, and commit abominations, and go to the penitentiary, is because they first do not learn the ruin of their own heart. They have not found out that "the heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked." They had an idea that they were almost right, and they built religion as a sort of extension, as an ornamental cupola. There was a superstructure of religion built on a substratum of unrepented sins. The trouble with a good deal of modern theology is that instead of building on the right foundation, it builds on the debris of an unregenerated nature. They attempt to rebuild Jerusalem before, in the midnight of conviction, they have seen the ghastliness of the ruin. They have such a poor foundation for their religion that the first north-east storm of temptation blows them down. A man comes to me to talk about religion. The first question I ask him is, "Do you feel yourself to be a sinner?" If he says, "Well, I—yes," the hesitancy makes me feel that that man wants a ride on Nehemiah's horse by midnight through the ruins—in by the gate of his affections, out by the gate of his will; and before he has got through with that midnight ride he will drop the reins on the horse's neck, and will take his right hand and smite on his heart and say, "God be merciful to me a sinner;" and before he has stabled his horse he will take his feet out of the stirrups, and he will slide down on the ground, and he will kneel, crying, "Have mercy on me, O God, according to thy loving kindness, according unto the multitude of thy tender mercies; blot out my transgressions, for I acknowledge my transgressions, and my sins are ever before thee." Ah, my friends, you see this is not a complimentary Gospel. That is what makes some people so mad. It comes to a man of a million dollars, and impenitent in his sins, and says, "You're a pauper." It comes to a woman of fairest cheek, who has never repented, and says, "You're a sinner." It comes to a man priding himself on his independence, and says, "You're bound hand and foot by the devil." It comes to our entire race and says, "You're a ruin, a ghastly ruin, an illimitable ruin." This grand redemption of the Gospel is a perfect farce if there is no ruin. "The whole need not a physician, but they that are sick." "If any one, though he be an angel from heaven, preach any other Gospel than this," says the apostle, "let him be accursed." There must be the midnight ride over the ruins before Jerusalem can be built. There must be the clicking of the hoofs before there can be the ring of the trowels.

Again, my subject gives me a specimen of busy and triumphant sadness. If there was any man in the world who had a right to mope and give up everything as lost, it was Nehemiah. You say, "He was a cup-bearer in the palace of Shushan, and that was a grand place." So it was. Of that palace was two hundred square, and the roof hovered over six marble pillars, each pillar six feet high; and the intense blue of the deep green of the forest foliage, the white of the driven snow, the trembling in the upholstery, the friends, you know very well that figure. Yet Nehemiah did not give up. When you see him going among the isolated streets, and by these distant towers, and by the torn-up grave of his father, you would suppose that he had been disheartened, and that he had dismounted from his horse and to his room and said: "Woe is in my father's grave is torn up. The dishonored. The walls are broken. I have no money with which to rebuild. I had never been born. I were dead." Not so says Nehemiah, though he had a grief so intense, excited the commentary of his penniless, expatriated Nehemiah rouses himself up to rebuild the city, gets his permission of absence, his passports. He hastens away from Jerusalem. By night on horseback through the ruins. He overcomes most ferocious opposition. He overcomes the piety and patriotism of the people, and in less than two months, namely two days, Jerusalem was rebuilt. What I call busy and triumphant

My friends, the whole temptation with you when you have trouble is just the opposite to the behavior of Nehemiah, and that is to give up. You say, "I have lost my child and can never get it again." You say, "I have lost my property and I never can repair my fortune." You say, "I have fallen into sin, and I never start again for a new life." If you make you form that resolution, and you keep it, he has ruined you. It is not sent to crush you, but to arouse you to animate you, to propel you. The smith does not thrust the iron into the anvil, and then blow away with the tongs, and then bring the hot iron to the anvil and beat with stroke after stroke to ruin the iron, but to prepare it for use. Oh that the Lord God of Israel would rouse up all broken-down people to rebuild. I knew a mother who buried her babe on Friday and on Sunday appeared in the house of God as usual. "Give me a class; give me a class." School class. I have no children, and I would like to have a class of little children. Give me real poor children. Give me a class of the back of the neck. That, I say, is beautiful. That is triumphant sadness. At three o'clock on Sabbath afternoon, for years, in a parlour in Philadelphia—a parlour and statuetted—there were fifty to twenty destitute children of the poor. Those destitute children received instruction, concluding with cake and sandwiches. How do I know that was going on for sixteen years? I know it in this way. That was the first time in Philadelphia where I was called to comfort a great sorrow. They had a son, a boy, and he had been drowned in the Branch. The father and mother idolized the boy, and the sob and wailing of that father and mother as they over the coffin resound in my ears. There seemed to be no use of prayer when I knelt down to pray, the only the room drowned out all the prayer. The Lord comforted that sorrow. I did not forget their trouble. If you go any afternoon into Laurel Street, you would find a monument with the name "Walter" inscribed upon it, and a wreath of fresh flowers around the name. There was not an hour in twenty years, winter or summer, when there was a wreath of fresh flowers around the name. But the Christian mother who sent those flowers there, having not beautiful. That is what I call busy and

THE DESTRUCTIVE MISSISSIPPI OVERFLOW AT MOUND CITY, ARK.

THE WESTERN FLOODS.

How Some of the Submerged Sections Looked at the Height of the Inundation—Much Suffering and Privation the Result.

To witness an ordinary-sized stream in flood is a thrilling sight. How much more so to view any of the great rivers of our continent in that condition? For many days past the Ohio, the Missouri, the Arkansas and the great "Fathers of Waters," the Mississippi, have been flooding their banks along a course covering in the aggregate many thousands of square miles, and doing incalculable damage. In last week's issue we referred to the western floods, and to-day we are enabled to present photographs showing the actual condition of affairs in some of the submerged sections. These views were taken in the neighborhood of Mound City and Marion City, Ark., and they may be accepted as fairly representative of the present state of many localities along the line of the Mississippi, where the river has swept over its embankments and transformed the surrounding country into a veritable sea.

On the Arkansas side of the Mississippi, at the point near which these photographs were taken, the whole of the western bank is high, and this bluff was a means of rescue for hundreds of persons who might otherwise have perished. On the opposite side, where the country is level, and in many places considerably lower than the river, the destruction was widespread. At Mound City, near the point where the Ohio joins the Mississippi, the country is land in town, except the railroad track and a portion of a hastily-constructed embankment.

Along the Mississippi flood line are many "chutes," being portions of the old Mississippi bed, which has been filled in by deposits from the river. Such deposits, being rich, alluvial soil from the river bottom, make exceptionally fine land for cultivation.

low and flat, but such a flood as the present has never been experienced, and this is the first time the locality has suffered from an inundation. Marion is five miles east from the Mississippi, when the river is in its ordinary condition, but just now, as the photograph shows, the entire town and surrounding country are in the grasp of the flood. There is not a dry acre of

There are many places from which, when the river is unusually high and the current swift, a quarter or even half a mile of bank will be apparently moved from one side of the stream to the other, the true explanation being that the constant changes in the river bed result in corresponding changes in the bank on either side. Sometimes the changes result in the formation of islands in mid-stream, and these islands or bottom lands are exceedingly rich soil, and grow splendid crops.

An early thaw invariably precedes a flood in the great rivers, which usually comes in May or June. The March rains this year have already brought about a phenomenal condition of affairs, which, if followed by an April thaw, may cause serious disaster during the next two or three months. In the west the annual spring thaw is invariably followed by what is known as the "June rise" in the rivers, and it is feared that this "rise" may be an unprecedented one this year.

It will be weeks before the full extent of the damage done by the present flood can be accurately determined. In Arkansas, southeast Missouri, Kentucky, and part of Louisiana and Mississippi, there is much suffering and privation. Hundreds of families have lost crops, cattle, buildings and all they possessed.

in the world. The Cumberland and Tennessee rivers also flooded the lower grounds and did heavy damage. In southeast Missouri and Arkansas it is estimated that between 500 and 800 square miles of land have been and much of it is still under water, and that 10,000 to 15,000 persons have been forced by the floods to vacate their homes. Notice has been issued by the Signal Service that the outlook for the lower Mississippi valley is very serious, and that a great flood this spring is probable. This timely warning should not pass unheeded by the people of that section. Nor is the present danger by any means over, for the latest information is that at Greenville and Vicksburg, Miss., the river is still rising and a large force of laborers is at work strengthening the embankments. Of the 1,100 miles of levees, thus far less than seven miles have given way but other and even larger breaks are feared. The official warning of the Weather Bureau declares that about April 10, the levees will be subjected to great strain in southeast Arkansas, western Mississippi, and in Louisiana. Should the levees break, the result will be one of the most disastrous floods ever known. Those living in districts overflowed in former years, are now transferring stock and movable property to places of known safety.

STILL IN THE THROES OF FAMINE.

India's Chief Justice Cables that More Help is Greatly Needed—The First Relief Ship now Loading and to Sail under Christian Herald Auspices.

RELIEF S. S. "CITY OF EVERETT," NOW LOADING AT SAN FRANCISCO FOR CALCUTTA.

THE cable message printed in fac-simile on this page presents in concrete form India's bitter need. The proprietor of this journal being anxious to obtain the latest authoritative news of the situation in the famine districts, cabled an inquiry to Chief Justice Sir Francis Maclean, who is chairman of the Government Relief Committee, to whom five thousand dollars was sent from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund. He replies that over and above the amount already received, fifty lacs of rupees will be needed. Reckoning the rupee at thirty-two cents, this statement shows a need of one million six hundred thousand dollars. Coming from so high an authority, this estimate must be accepted as absolutely accurate, and is evidently based on official reports, from all districts, of the number of starving people who are dependent for their existence on public charity. The reluctance of the Government to make any appeal for some weeks after the crisis developed, renders this admission of the stupendous provision required, all the more significant.

It must be remembered, too, that besides the number of starving known to the Committee, there is a large extent of scarcity unknown to its members. Stretching through the vast region, from north to south, are the villages in which people have no means of making their wants known to the Committee in Calcutta. With the shrinking from appealing to charity characteristic of the respectable classes, the people of these villages have suffered silently, making their small store go as far as it would, until they are too weak to travel to the relief works. They appeal to the missionaries, or to anyone who may have the power to help, and if their cry is unheeded they lie down by the roadside and die. Rev. T. S. Johnson, of Jabalpur, in a recent letter to Dr. A. B. Leonard of the Methodist Board, says: "Hundreds and thousands are dying of starvation. For God's sake encourage whatever our people in America may be inclined to do to help save as many as possible of the perishing people around us." Mr. Johnson adds that "grim awful famine prevails and must continue until October at the least."

Rev. J. W. Robinson of Lucknow, confirms this statement and adds that "the pinch is becoming more severe daily and we are much oppressed by the suffering around us and our inability to help. The awfulness of the famine can only be realized when one has to live in the midst of it. It fairly takes the heart out of a man to see starvation on every side. And this is what we must see for at least six months more and be unable to help." Mr. Robinson expresses his regret that through missionary statements from India, the Christian people of America should have thought that the shipload of corn which it was proposed to send several months ago was not needed.

In view of the urgent and authoritative appeals, we have no doubt as to our duty. The good work now going on through the efforts of our readers should continue. At the same time, grain is being distributed to the missionaries, which has been provided with the money supplied by the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. It was soon exhausted. What shall the missionaries do for the hungry people? We are confident that our readers will go on with the work, and that they will not suffer the people whom they have supported thus far, to starve. Let every Christian who loves the Lord Jesus Christ now prove his love by feeding the people in his name.

Pundita Ramabai, a cultured Hindoo lady who is well known in this country and is herself actively engaged in relief work, eloquently voices the need of prompt help. She writes: "The sad sight of aged men and delicate women stretching out their sore hands and begging you to help them, pouring out their sorrow into your ears, and lamenting their sore fate, while their tearful eyes look straight into yours, to find out whether there is a particle of sympathy for them, is altogether too much to bear, for a person having a heart of by immersion, probably the largest number on record at one place and time since the day of Pentecost." This testimony of the former experiment is most encouraging. What may we hope from the distribution now going on at the forty-six stations throughout India through the gifts of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD!

Our readers will welcome the news that the movement to send a Famine Relief ship from these shores to India, carrying food for the starving millions in that land, has taken practical shape, and that the first vessel is now being loaded at San Francisco. She is the large 4,000 ton whaleback steamer, City of Everett, and she has been chartered by the United States Navy Department and placed at the disposal of the Famine Fund expressly for this purpose. In this initial enterprise, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has the active co-operation of the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce, whose special committee has labored heroically to make it successful. Generous donations of corn have been received for the first cargo from many of the Western States, including California, Illinois, Nebraska, Colorado and Kansas, and the great railroad lines of the West have given liberal transportation facilities. Rev. Dr. R. G. Hobbs, of Jacksonville, Ill., (whose activity in the relief work was mentioned in last week's issue of this journal), aroused the enthusiasm of the farmers, millers, merchants and citizens generally in the great Illinois grain belt, and was instrumental in securing nearly half of the first cargo.

Many other noble Christian men and women, church organizations and societies, and residents in rural communities gave valuable aid. Secretary Perry, of the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce is so poor that a mite cannot be. Some can give a sack or two of group of neighbors or a little village community can readily fill a car. Other, ferently situated, can give, not a money. All will be needed, and a gift will be welcome. Even r corn-trains are flying westward, la bread and blessing for India. 1 cargo will set sail from an eastern probably New York.

Congress is being importuned by bill directing the Secretary of the charter and place at the disposal of Relief Fund, as many more ships be needed to carry these corn gifts to India. The following resolution was presented to Congress last week:

NEW YORK, March
To the Honorable the United States Representatives:

WHEREAS, A large section of India with a population of nearly fifty millions has been so affected by repeated failure of crops as most of these inhabitants down to the starvation, and

WHEREAS, Millions are now in imminent danger of death while thousands are dying of actual want of food, and

WHEREAS, The famine now prevailing is infinitely worse than that which prevailed in 1877, when nearly six million people died, and

WHEREAS, kind, sympathetic, Christians in Colorado, Kansas, Nebraska, Indian Territory and other parts of the United States have offered to contribute corn and other large quantities toward the relief of these wretched people in distant India.

NOW THEREFORE, The undersigned memorialize your honorable body to pass a resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to transport from New York for two weeks grain for the famine-stricken people of India not to exceed $50,000, to be paid out of appropriated funds in the hands of said Secretary, providing for the grain being guaranteed by petitioners.

Many of the gifts of our readers are the kind that bring a blessing on the receiver. They represent the first self-denial and like the two mites widow cast into the treasury were valued by Christ not by their pecuniary but by their spiritual significance.

The following pathetic letter was written in a large round hand, from a little Chicago to the children of India for itself:

Dear Children—We hope you will not until my money gets to you. I would love more, but we are poor. I am six years old.

Elsie Danforth, Silver Springs writes:

My papa takes your paper and read it to the people in India being hungry and having to eat. I have earned a dollar and like them to have it if you will send it to me nine years old, and it is the best I can Enclosed is a small gift for the famine in India. It will help a little. No Christian knowingly permit a brother to die of starvation or anywhere.

"Friend of India" wishes us to mention a suggestion to readers who that they cannot afford to give a to the starving people of India:

I suggest to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in view of the fact that one keep a native alive for a day, that everyone one meal a week, and give to the starving the money that meal would have cost, vary from five cents to two dollars, but if was, it would be an offering acceptable to as it would be the result of self-denial.

The following sums have been received for the work, but there are literal sands crowded out of this issue will be acknowledged hereafter:

flesh. Why do not good Christian people in England and America send money to the missionaries in this country, who are so anxious to help the poor people and are trying hard to do as much as they can for them, but cannot do much for want of means?" By this time, the good lady has learned that her appeal was answered before it reached us, and that the Christian people of America have done precisely what she desired.

It is gratifying to see in the Bombay Guardian that the prediction made in this journal some time ago, of the help the benefaction of Christian people would be to the missionaries, in their spiritual work, is likely to be fulfilled. Mr. H. St. Dalmas who writes from Schore, in Central India, reminds the Christian world of a vast harvest of souls that came through missionary relief administered in a former famine. He says that when the Telegu missionaries fed the people then, "Many of the natives wished at once to become Christians, or to become connected with the religion of those who were helping them in their time of need. But the missionaries said to them: 'Wait till the famine is over, and when you are no longer dependent upon us, if you still wish to become Christians, we will gladly receive you.' After being thus tested there were found to be large numbers who were considered to be true converts, and thousands were added to the church. In one day 2,220 were baptized Committee, together with his associates, worked day and night, and met generous responses everywhere. The proprietor of this journal bore the expense of kiln-drying large quantities of the corn and of transporting much of the cargo overland to the Pacific seaboard. The entire cargo, after being loaded, is to be in charge of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, whose representative goes with it in the Government vessel across the ocean, and attends to all the details of distribution on arrival at Calcutta, the port of destination.

Meanwhile, we urge our friends everywhere to supplement this glorious beginning by preparing now for A Second Cargo. Vessels will not be wanting to carry it, and to bear to India all the offerings of food our people are ready to send. It is a work that will be rich with blessing to all engaged in it. We therefore ask every reader of this journal, every pastor of a Christian church, every church officer, Sunday School Superintendent or Teacher, every church member, and every member of any of the various church societies, to lend a hand and raise a voice. Let hearts and purses and corn-cribs be opened. Send your gifts in liberal measure. For all who love the Master and delight to do him service, there never has been, and never again may be, such a golden opportunity. We trust and pray that every one may have share in this, the grandest relief work of the century. None

India.

FROM now till next June, at least, the people of India must continue to suffer from want; and even then, unless copious rains fall meanwhile, their condition will be a most wretched one. Absolute failure of crops this summer in the central provinces, may involve months of privation and suffering, with a mortality terrible to contemplate. Knowing this to be the situation, our people are now bending every energy to help India in her time of grievous distress. Already our readers have sent $30,000 to buy food, which the American missionaries are now distributing at some forty stations where famine exists. The dearth of grain in India has awakened the sympathies of our own farmers, whose corncribs are full to overflowing, and soon a loaded grain-ship, the City of Everett, will sail from San Francisco for Calcutta with a cargo of American corn. The government has placed this steamer at the disposal of a Relief Committee of the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce, and she goes to India under the auspices of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, whose readers, by their generous gifts, have done much to secure the success of the enterprise.

Those of us who have visited wondrous India are additionally interested in the rescue of her people from starvation. The two enterprises now go side by side—giving to India the bread of this life and the bread of eternal life. The work which shoemaker Carey inaugurated at Serampore, India, translating the Bible into forty different dialects, and leaving his worn-out body amid the natives whom he had come to save, and going up into the heavens from which he can better watch all the help—that work will be completed in the salvation of the millions of India. But how much the work will be accelerated by the practical sympathy of Christian nations in sending them temporal succor. All India will believe that there must be something in a religion which takes care of the body as well as of the souls of the people ten thousand miles away. More missionaries to carry the one kind of bread, more ships to carry the other.

A Purer Press.

I will take more than the snow-waters of all her proud mountains to wash the skirts of Nevada. She is no longer the state of silver-crags, but the rendezvous of prize-fighters. Carson never will outgrow the degradation of that day when, within her limits, two coarse-grained men, their abettors and admirers, congregated from all quarters of the country; from city and hamlet, men, boys and women, the poor and the rich, the Governor, and the legislators have made their record. Let them have their reward. The competitors for victory laid down their garments at their feet. It is no longer the cock-fights or the dog-fights or the bull-fights of former days, but the man-fights which are attractive to the men of this generation. This is evolution backward. Manly sport, indeed! The motto of Nevada is, "All for the country," meaning its mountains of silver. What of its prize-fights? Are they dying? The country would be excused.

This is what did it. Because the penny papers will do it, we must. Decent papers would not have touched the prize-fight with the tongs had it not been for the indecent ones. For, the time being, it seemed as though the managers of decent papers had lost their heads. They certainly had lost their consciences. Did they forget the thousands of children who would get their first impressions of a prize-fight from the pictures in their columns, who for weeks would repeat in miniature, what happened at Carson? The writer once saw an elegantly dressed gentleman on a Hudson River steamer, offer one of his little boys the sugar in the bottom of a tumbler of grog, and we felt like annihilating him. These newspaper managers, what shall we say to them? Is this the satanic press?

The attitude of newspapers toward deeds of crime and sin, should be that of a public censor. If crime and sin are recorded, it should be the merest record. No details should be given. As it is now if a benevolent man, an editor, a minister, a saint dies, the intelligence, if properly paid for, may have two or three lines in a daily paper. The suicide, the murderer, the man tried for crime, the victim of the gallows; these have column after column allotted to them.

If, as a nation, we continue to sow the wind, we shall reap the whirlwind. It is the press which propagates crime by giving detailed accounts of it. A single execution often makes an epidemic of murders. Public executions are done away with. But, we have the details of them brought into our very nurseries.

The Kingdom Coming.

GOD is getting the world ready for something grand and paradisaical. We cannot see all the links of the chain by which he will draw the world back into its proper sphere, but that both ends of the chain are in his hands is a fact beyond discussion. The great secular enterprises of the day will be found to be piers of a bridge on which Christ will march to his final conquest. The waters are his, the storms are his, the lightnings are his, the earth is his. All events are marching in procession, and will halt not nor wheel to right or left until they reach the foot of Christ's throne of universal dominion. All hail the day of the world's disenchantment and redemption. Let us be watchful of events. Study the Bible to see the prophecies, then study the newspapers to see how the prophecies are coming to fulfilment. Livingstone's travels were secular, but they opened the way for the redemption of Africa.

Sir Rowland Hill's penny postage was secular, but the fulfiling of Christian correspondence was born of that project. The art of printing was secular, but it has filled Christendom with Bibles. In other words, there are no secular events, for they are harvested to Christian results. Engineering and astronomy and navigation are abettors of Christianity. Take courage. They who toil for the right shall be in vast majority. The air is already stirred with the wings of the apocalyptic angel.

The Bread Winners of the Nation.

A PAPER FOR FARMERS.

WRITE to magnify the ancient and honorable guild of husbandry; for before kingcraft and priestcraft were born, husbandry had possessed "the garden of God" and brought under its control the pleasant lands "lying between the rivers." Husbandry is the corner-stone of all national prosperity, and no nation has dared to neglect it; while it is worth noticing that not from the priesthood, and not from the royal house, came the prophets and deliverers of the chosen people of God; they were taken from the plough and the threshing-floor and the sheep-fold.

Of the literature which has been saved from the wreck of past centuries, much of it relates to this subject. The works of Hesiod are strictly agricultural; Pliny laments over more than forty books on this subject lost in his day; Xenophon's Economics treat of farming and household matters; and Mago, the founder of the family from which sprang Hannibal and Hamilcar, wrote twenty-eight books on farming and the breeding of sheep and cattle. These books were standard authorities for many centuries, and Mago's Libyan Ox of 600 years before Christ, would be a very likely fellow anywhere 1897 years after Christ. The passage has been often quoted, but it will bear quoting again: "The young ox which you buy should be square in their form, large limbed, with strong, lofty, dark-colored horns, broad and curly fronts, rough ears, black eyes and lips, expanded nostrils, long and brawny neck, ample dewlaps, wide chest, well-bowed ribs, broad in the loin—slightly depressed in the back; straight, firm legs; large hoofs; long and bushy tail, and the body covered with thick, short hair of a red, or tawny color."

Among the Roman writers on farming were Cato, Varro, Virgil, Columella, and Palladius. Varro's treatise was dedicated to his wife; and though other men have "dared" since, it is those that "make way" that are worthy of honor. The women of the 19th century ought not to forget Varro. All these old Roman farmers were against what the English call "high farming." Their way was the simplest possible: a crop of grain and a crop of fallow. All of them agree about the advantage of early sowing, and their wisdom has been collected into a proverb, which says: "Early sowing sometimes deceives the farmer; late sowing, never—because the crop is always bad."

Sir Anthony Fitzherbert, in 1534, may be regarded as the first English writer on agriculture. He enunciated the principle "that a farmer cannot thrive by his corn without cattle; nor by his cattle, without corn." Tusser's "500 Points of Good Husbandry" was written a hundred years later; and after Tusser came Sir Hugh Platte and Jehro Hull. The latter was the first who attempted new modes of culture, and improved implements. He invented the horse-hoe, drill husbandry, and a threshing machine; though the flail was extensively used within my own memory. Then came Arthur Young who made long journeys and patient experiments in behalf of farming. He tested the value of common salt and ammonia in manures, and reiterated after every trial "the volatile alkali continues to triumph." He discovered the importance of chemistry in farming, and pointed out that path which Dickson, Johnson, Lord Kames, Sir Humphrey Davy, Darwin, Knight, and Liebig have investigated with such wonderful results.

The last half century has fully recognized the high calling of the farmer; princes now aspire to be "model farmers;" science caters for the occupation, and mechanics is its hired servant. In the United States this is especially the case; no country, in any age, has done so much for farming. Its plows, reapers, mowers, its spades and hoes, are known all over the world for their lightness and strength; it has greatly improved the horse-rake, invented sowers, sub-soil and trenching plows, cultivators, threshing and winnowing machines, &c., and in fact, has done more for the science of farming in fifty years than has been done for some sciences in a thousand.

There are sciences that have grown aged, and fallen from the world like an old garment; there are others the world remembers only as a man remembers his childhood's toys; but farming has only just finished its 6,000 years of childhood; only just begun to understand the mighty promise implied in the command, "replenish the earth and subdue it." Lord Erskine says, "you might as well hope to see the body in motion, when palsy has reached the heart, as expect to see manufactures, art, industry of any kind progressive when agriculture has declined." And yet, universal as it is in influence, agriculture can only succeed by the operation of the same great principle that influences all other human industry—individual interest. Therefore, it is the duty of everyone in general, as of farmers in particular, to resist imperatively all legislation, and all other combinations, which will thwart this principle.

Neither commerce, nor education, nor valor, will make a nation great, or lasting, if it be not agricultural. Where are the armies of Rome, of the Goths, and the Vandals? Where are the mighty fleets of Tyre, and Sidon, Genoa, and Venice? Will our schools and colleges feed and clothe us? No, the farmer is the bread-winner of the nation. Let us then give honor to whom honor is due. Let every one, however humble, lift up his voice against anything which may shackle the bandman, whether it comes from private monopoly, or public legislation; so shall the garner be full and plenteous with all of store; our sheep bring forth thousands; our oxen be strong and plenteous; and there be no complaining in our streets.

BRIEF NOTES.

Rev. Thomas Harrison commended "Home Camp Meeting" on April 3d, in the ministerial M. E. Church, Mariners' Harbor, Island. It will continue ten days, and is attracting a large attendance.

Major Whittle expects to begin a London about the middle of this month. Mrs. Stebbins, who have been helping him work in Scotland, have been obliged to take rest to recuperate, but hope to be with him beginning of his work in the metropolis.

Dr. A. J. Diaz, of Cuba, who had so an escape of his life at the hands of Gen. Butchers, is now laboring in New York preaches in the Fourteenth Street Theatre Sunday afternoon, and has opened a free ary in connection with the North Baptist

The seventeen Bible classes, organized by Rev. D. M. Stearns will continue meetings during Mr. Stearns' tour among missionary stations of the world. Rev. Geo. Needham will take charge of the New York Brooklyn classes. Mr. Stearns hopes to res labor in the autumn.

The American Bible Society made, at its recent meeting of volumes to the value of hundred dollars for distribution in Austria. W. Clark, of Prague, reports that last year bution in Bohemia has had excellent results six hundred complete copies of the Bible; nine thousand portions were put in circulation.

Mr. H. M. Stanley, recommends a bronze column thirty feet high erected in the grave of Livingstone. He estimates the cost at twenty-five thousand dollars. The column, which will suffice as a memorial until it comes when the white population of British Central Africa will raise something more substantial and more worthy of the great missionary.

Judson Memorial Church, New York, by an excellent arrangement with Mrs. Anne Hall, of Saratoga, N. Y., the well-known philanthropist. Mrs. Hall gives the church thousand dollars on condition of the trusting interest on the amount during her life. Mrs. Hall's object is to prevent a contest, will be waged after her death.

The American Sunday School Union celebrate its seventy-third anniversary at New York, on April 25th. A special meeting held in the Brick Presbyterian Church, a Morris K. Jessup, Esq., President of the Union, and Dr. J. M. Crowell, Missionary Secretary, Dr. Wm. R. Taylor, Dr. O. P. Gilchrist, other friends of the Union are expected to take part in the exercises.

Mr. Ira D. Sankey is assisting this week the State Sunday School Convention of California, which is being held in San Francisco. He is a cordial welcome to the city, and expects meetings in various churches during his stay. Thence he will go to Portland, Ore., to Seattle and Spokane, Wash., holding meetings at each place. Immense audiences gather where he is known that he will sing.

Reports from Madagascar state that the missionaries and converts are suffering under the Roman Catholic opposition to French government than they ever did in the days of heathenism. The London Missionary Society especially has been informed by its agents on the island that persecution is carried on with "bitterness, audacity, persistency and unflinching equal to anything that has marked persecutions in days gone by."

The International Convention of the Men's Christian Association will be held at Atlanta, April 21-25. Among the leading speakers are Bishop Davis Sessums, of Louisiana; and Rev. J. L. Kirkland, of Vanderbilt University. Rev. C. I. Schofield, of East Northfield, Me., will conduct the Bible studies. John R. M. Luther D. Wishard, international secretary, presents reports upon the extension of work among students and young men in the foreign countries they have visited.

The school for Christian workers at Springfield, Mass., is in future to be known as the Normal College. The change of name was made at a meeting of the trustees of the school, of the fact that the extent and aims of the institution justify the more comprehensive title. It also decided to abandon the Physical Department and add a department of Psychology, Pedagogy, and Sociology. Dr. George E. Dawson, of Logan University will have charge of the new department.

Nine churches of different denominations on the north side of Chicago have joined in reclaiming Beulah Home, 474 Fullerton avenue, a reclamation of fallen girls. It is under the direction of the Central Ministerial Association, and is being supervised by O. H. Richards. The institution is accomplishing a great work in the inmates to Christ and saving them from idleness. Of the seventy girls received the last six months, all but five have been converted and are leading consistent Christian lives.

An effort to unite the two branches of the Presbyterian Church is to be made this summer. The Northern Assembly will meet on May 2d at the grounds of the Winona Assembly and School Association, Indiana, and Dr. J. A. Row, of Chicago, the retiring moderator, will preach the sermon. The Southern Assembly will meet at Charlotte, N. C., the same date. Dr. R. L. A. being the preacher. At both Assemblies the question of the organic union of the two bodies will come up in the form of a proposition to meet next year at Louisville, Ky.

Sweden's Exhibition.

NEXT month is to witness the opening of an International Exhibition which will interest the whole of Scandinavia and will attract a host of admiring visitors from other lands. It will be held in Stockholm, the first Scandinavian Exhibition held in 1866. Already the site swarms with workmen putting the finishing touches to the buildings in which the exhibits are gathered. They will represent the Kingdoms of Norway, Sweden, Denmark, and Finland, in the industrial departments, while all Europe has been laid out for its art treasures. Emperor Prince Eugene, the youngest son of King Oscar, made a tour through the Kingdoms of Europe, and personally inspected the leading artists to send pictures to the exhibition. The buildings comprise a Grand Gallery, an Industrial Hall, a Fishery Hall, and a Fishery Hall. They have been erected at the edge of the Djurgården, a great pleasure resort of the Swedes, among the giant trees, picturesque rocks and sunny meadows, which form a great park one of the most delightful holiday scenes of the world. It is a narrow arm of land stretching out into the sea, the land rising in terraces from the center, sloping to the water on both sides. The Fishery Hall is so situated as to command half its length, and to give a view of the city and the harbor. The exhibits are seen in the immediate surroundings. Near the edge of the garden, are numerous zoological gardens, with the most interesting and interesting and museum which are permanent attractions well-known to visitors to the city. The Swedes are very enthusiastic for the achievement to which they have long been looking forward. Since the first exhibition in 1866, there have been two Scandinavian exhibitions,—one in 1874, and the other in 1888—but both of them were held at Copenhagen. The Swedish people cordially contributed to the success, but national pride stirs them to make this the finest and best of the world. During the thirty-one years that have elapsed since Sweden was the hostess of the exhibition, there has been a wonderful change in all the departments of science and industry. Scandinavia has kept well abreast of other nations in the march of progress and improvement, and this fact is proved by the exhibits. It is gratifying to know that in the moral qualities which constitute the real strength of a nation, Sweden is also well to the front. The Swedes are apt to set small value on this, but a nation's progress, but a higher quality than they have declared that it is the glory of a nation. (Prov. 14: 34.)

Plate Tombstones.

A suggestion is made by a journal devoted to the glass trade that glass is superior to any other material for the inscription on the memorials we raise in cemeteries over the last resting places of our beloved dead. The journal contends that ordinary plate glass is better adapted for an enduring monumental structure than the hardest marble or granite known to stone masons, glass being, in fact, practically indestructible: it is not subject to heat, and cold have their well-known effect upon even the hardest rock. It is a granite eventually crumbling away, and the obliteration uncommon of an inscription on a stone gravestone only fifty years old. On the other hand, a glass structure for such purposes will present as fresh an appearance a couple of centuries after its manufacture, it is asserted, as on the day it was erected, and the inscription ineffaceable. A better way still of leaving an imperishable record in the world after we have left it than a glass tombstone, though it may have all the enduring qualities claimed for it, would be to live a life so beneficent and helpful that the gratitude and love of people we have made happy would follow us beyond the grave.

Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord... their works do follow them. (Rev. 14: 13.)

A Living Express Package.

An ingenious drunkard was brought into a New York police court a few days ago on the complaint of the driver of an express wagon. According to the story told there, the man had imbibed so much liquor in the northern districts of the city that the elevated roads and the surface-car employees refused to accept him as a passenger. Finally, he made his way to an express office and induced one of the men to carry him as freight to the Brooklyn Bridge. He was lifted into the wagon and he promptly lay down and went contentedly to sleep. On his arrival at the bridge, he was awakened and was reand walked to the altar. Taking up the child she announced in loud voice that she had been commanded to offer it in sacrifice. The people in the church were startled but did not seem to realize the woman's meaning until they saw her take the child by the throat and proceed to strangle it. Then a man rushed to her and snatched the infant from her grasp. She fought fiercely with him but was overpowered and detained until a physician came and administered a quieting potion. Her husband was found and took charge of her and the babe. Doubtless the poor creature's mind was unbalanced and was probably oppressed by remorse for some past sin. It is sad that since Christ made atonement for sin she should have suffered so much as she must have done before she could have overcome a mother's natural love for her offspring and have yielded to the suggestion which the ancient prophet put away as an offense to God:

Shall I give my first-born for my transgression, the fruit of my body for the sin of my soul? (Hosea 6: 7.)

A Disabled Steamer.

An anxious week was passed by the passengers and crew of the steamer Niagara during her recent voyage from Nassau in the Bahamas to New York. Two days after leaving Nassau the Captain noticed from the erratic movements of the vessel that she was not answering to her rudder. An investigation was made at once and it was found that the helm was bent and broken. A temporary makeshift was constructed and with this the Niagara attempted to continue her voyage. For nearly two days the vessel was in the utmost danger and rolled so heavily that the passengers feared she would turn turtle and go to the bottom.

actually sees the effect of his voice. One ball responds to one note and others to different notes. As a ball vibrates, the air within it causes the drum-head to vibrate, too, and instantly the flame of the gas-jet jumps. Thus a deaf person who knew the system could see, by watching the gas-jets what note had been sounded, and as each jumped in turn, could construct a perfect record of the music without hearing a note. Photography constructs such a record. By the usual process a series of rapid photographs are taken registering the notes as the gas-jets shoot upward in response to the vibration of the drum-head in the spheres, of which they are respectively the key-notes. Thus, as in the phonograph, a permanent record may be kept of a singer's performance. When we read of this wonderful achievement of science, it does not seem hard to believe the assurance that Christ gave, that all our words are registered against the great day of account:

I say unto you that every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give account thereof in the day of judgment. (Matt. 12: 36.)

Discovery of Fossil Bones.

A remarkable discovery has been made by the great geologist, Dr. Dubois, in the island of Java. There is a small stream in the island which in the course of ages has cut for itself a passage between steep banks forty feet high. The lowest layer of these banks belongs to the era known to geologists as the tertiary formation, which from a human standpoint is extremely remote, but in the vast reach of geological research is comparatively recent. In this stratum are found the petrified remains of animals utterly unknown to us in this age, although some of them have characteristics which are thought by scientists to prove they were the ancestors of the buffalo, antelope, hyena, and crocodile. Several perfect specimens were dug out by Dr. Dubois' laborers, affording the scientist the means of forming a mental picture of what the world looked like at the period when these tertiary strata were the surface of the earth, and the great creatures roamed through the forests and plains. One day the spade of a laborer turned up something that to the keen eye of the scientist differed essentially from all previous finds. It consisted of a skull, with a number of teeth and a thigh bone. His knowledge of comparative anatomy convinced Dr. Dubois that these remains belonged to none of the animals whose fossils he had previously found. The thigh bone must have belonged to a creature who walked erect, and not on all-fours, and one who had feet much like the human foot in its muscular arrangement. The teeth were not those of an animal which relied on them for its defence or for tearing its prey, but had become smaller, and like the human teeth. The skull, too, might have been the skull of an ape, or of an undeveloped savage. It had a brain capacity larger than that of any ape we now have, but smaller than that of ordinary men. The brows are heavy, the forehead sharply receding, and the ears much nearer the crown of the head than in the human head. Whether the creature was man or ape it is impossible to decide from the remains that have been found. The astonishing fact is that such a creature should have existed at the time when this stratum was uppermost on the earth. Previous to this discovery, no remains at all resembling the human body had been found among the fossils of the period. The discovery has given rise to many speculations about the order to which the remains belong. The difference of opinion even among scientific men shows that what elevates man above the brute is not so much in his physical conformation as in the soul, as to the eternal interests of which the majority of mankind are indifferent.

Who knoweth the spirit of man that goeth upward, and the spirit of the beast that goeth downward to the earth? (Eccles. 3: 21.)

quired to pay the express charges; but he insisted that his contract called for a journey across the bridge. As he stubbornly refused to pay, the express-man took him to the nearest police station, where he was locked up for the night. The morning brought a clearer view of the situation, and he was glad to pay the express charges and escape with a reproof from the judge. The curious feature of this case is that a man so much under the influence of liquor as to be rejected by the ticket agents of the Elevated Road and the conductors of surface-cars, should yet have retained sense enough to devise the plan of expressing himself to the bridge. He was able to realize that he had, by his indulgence, abnegated his dignity as a man, and had become a mere chattel, to be treated as common freight.

They have stricken me, shalt thou say, and I was not sick; they have beaten me and I felt it not. (Prov. 23: 35.)

A Sacrifice Prevented.

In the course of a series of reminiscences recently given to the press is a strange incident which occurred in a town in the northern part of New York state. One Friday morning there were several persons in a large Roman Catholic Church where Lenten services were being held. The service had not commenced, and all was quiet in the church when a well-dressed woman entered with a child in her arms. There was a look of tension in her face as one in acute distress of mind. But there was no hesitation in her manner as she walked with firm step up the aisle and laid the sleeping babe on the steps of the altar. Leaving it there she crossed the church to an alcove in which was an image of the Virgin. She knelt before it in prayer for some moments and then rose

Happily a British steamer was sighted and in response to the Niagara's appeal undertook to tow her to New York. The two vessels had proceeded only a few miles when the hawser broke and the disabled vessel was again rolling helplessly between the waves. A new hawser was passed to the Niagara the next day and the voyage was resumed. It was thought best to put in at Charleston, S. C., where the passengers were landed and sent home. Neither captain nor crew has any idea how the vessel's steering apparatus was injured. They only know that when the helm was not under control, small as that part of the vessel is, the whole ship and her cargo and human lives on board were liable to perish. Happily help came in time to avert the catastrophe. There are many souls in similar predicament to whom help is offered, but who are not saved. They do not realize, as these sailors did, that without the power of guidance they are in peril and can be saved only by being taken in hand by one who is able to save.

The way of man is not in himself; it is not in the man that walketh to direct his steps. (Jer. 10: 23.)

Photographing Sounds.

An ingenious arrangement for making a photographic record of speaking or singing, which has been devised by professor Hallock of Columbia College, is described by the New York Herald. It is based on the well-known fact that every vibrating body has a key-note or pitch to which it responds. The Professor's apparatus consists of a series of hollow metallic balls, each of which has a different key-note. There is a hole in each ball covered with a membranous drum-head, and on the other side of it there is a lighted gas-jet. The balls are suspended so as to hang free, and a person singing among them

THE RESURRECTION.

Sunday School Lesson for April 18.
1. Cor. 15: 12-36. Golden Text 1.
Cor. 15: 20. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

RESURRECTION and judgment are necessarily connected. If it were proved beyond a doubt that life in this world is the beginning and the end of man's existence, the godless would be justified in their infidel argument. "If the dead are not raised, let us eat and drink, for tomorrow we die" (1. Cor. 15: 32, R.V.). But if indeed this life is but the preparation for another; if indeed we are on our probation, if we Christians "must all be made manifest before the judgment seat of Christ: that each may receive the things done in the body, according to what he hath done, whether it be good or bad" the resurrection is of the utmost import to the children of God. And if the great white throne, and him that sits upon it, with his unerring "books" in which the records of every sinner's life are written, awaits the ungodly; if they, "small and great," must "stand before God," and, as Daniel tells us (12: 1), these "awake out of the dust of the earth" to "shame and everlasting contempt," then the resurrection must be of terrible moment to those who reject their God. We are saved and unsaved alike. All we are, and say, and do, has a bearing upon another life, to which we are hastening. If we really believe this, we look upon everything present in its relation to the future, and every day, every hour, we are sowing for a harvest which is to come (Gal. 6: 7, 8). Some are sowing to the flesh to "reap corruption," to have all their life work turned into ashes, as hay, straw, stubble (1. Cor. 3: 12-15), some are sowing to the Spirit, to "reap life everlasting;" gold, silver, precious stones, which pass through the fire, and are only purified thereby. Some look forward to the resurrection as their emancipation: citizens of heaven, they look for a Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall fashion anew their body of humiliation, "that it may be conformed to the body of Christ" (Phil. 3: 20, 21); others, if they believe in the resurrection at all, are filled with terror for the time when they will be exposed and found out in all the shame of their nakedness (Rom. 3: 18).

The sect of the Sadducees said that there was "no resurrection, neither angel nor spirit" (Acts 13: 8); it was gross materialism; but there is another side of error—spiritualism which is equally gross: gross because self-centered. The adherents of both of these systems ignore or evade their responsibility to God. Paul controverts the Sadducean error by showing that faith in Christ is without foundation if there be no resurrection. In such a case, Christ is not risen, and what then becomes of his atonement and his intercession?

"If Christ Be Not Raised,

ye are yet in your sins," there is no proof that his death has been accepted, there is no power acting in heaven for you to enable you to live a holy life. It is the living Christ at God's right hand who can meet both the accusations of the enemy against us, and also work deliverance for us. His presence there is the only guarantee we have that we are accepted only "in the Beloved" (1. John 1: 6).

And his resurrection, as the head of his body, the church, is the guarantee of the resurrection of the whole body, when he shall have made it one as he and the Father are One (John 17: 23). But now is Christ risen from the dead and become the first fruits of them that slept," or R. V., "are asleep." He is the first man who has risen from the dead to die no more, "death hath no more dominion over him" (Rom. 6: 9). When God gave Daniel the prophet to see the resurrection, the prophet had not yet light enough to see that between the resurrection to everlasting life and the resurrection to shame and everlasting contempt the thousand years must elapse, during which Satan shall be bound with a great chain and the saints of the first resurrection "blessed and holy" shall reign with Christ (Rev. 21: 6). Christ is the first-fruits of the resurrection to everlasting life, the corn of wheat which fell into the ground and died that it might bring forth much fruit. (John 12: 24.)

It was by man that death came, it must be by man that death must be conquered; the only proof that sin is really conquered is the conquest of sin's penalty, death. As in Adam all died, so in the Christ, and in no other way shall all men be made alive, by the Spirit of the Lord." (11. Cor. 3: 18). Like Christ they, too, are a people who die to themselves, who are buried with Christ in baptism unto death, and whose life is a life out of death, "newness of life," "not I live, but Christ liveth in me." (Gal. 2: 20).

"Then cometh the end." All is waiting for "they that are Christ's." "The earnest expectation of the creation waiting for the manifestation of the sons of God" (Rom. 8: 19), the "people for his name" for whom he has visited the Gentiles. (Acts 15: 14). Until this people is made up the end cannot come, all is in suspense until the sun-clothed woman (the Church) of Rev. 12, can bring forth a man child, composed of fully developed sons of God, whom Christ in the first act of his coming will be justified in catching away "to God and his throne." This accomplished, then cometh the end, the great time of tribulation ending with the harvest.

CONVERSIONS AT ANTIOCH.

Alternative S. S. Lesson for April 18. Acts 11: 19-30. Golden Text, Acts 11: 18.

AN alternative lesson has been provided by the Committee for the use of teachers who prefer continuing the study of the history of the early Church, to taking up the subject of the Resurrection. The subject chosen is the Conversions at Antioch. It is interesting to us because of its description of the further extension of the Church from its Jewish boundaries into the non-Jewish world. The mother Church at Jerusalem into matters at Antioch. This city was one of the most important in the world at that time. It had about half a million inhabitants, and was an enterprising and wealthy city.

Situated near the sea-coast, about a hundred miles north of Jerusalem, was the meeting place of caravans traveling east and west, where merchants exchanged their commodities. It was a city notorious for its vice and, at Damascus, which were proverbial for their excesses. It was natural that a church gathered from among its people should be regarded with suspicion. The choice of Barnabas as an investigator was remarkable, as he was not one of the Judaizing brethren and would be likely to deal leniently with irregularities if they existed. He evinced the doubts of the others, but he arrived at Antioch and found the genuine, he was glad and rejoiced to come the Gentile converts. Having testified himself of the sincerity of the believers, he went to Tarsus to summon Paul to his assistance. That he had sought his aid rather than the aid of Peter, James, or John, showed his Paul had been specially designated as a missionary to the Gentiles (Acts 13: 1-3). Barnabas doubtless felt sure that the work would be favorable to the movement. The two men worked together there a year. It is worthy of notice that the Antioch church should have taken collection for the distressed Jewish Christians in Jerusalem. Whatever doubt the mother Church had entertained about converts would be removed when men whom it sent to investigate, returned with these practical proofs that the Gentiles had the spirit of Christ. Antioch church soon afterward sent missionaries, thus giving further proof of its genuine Christian spirit. One fact is put on record. The people of Antioch were noted for their dexterity in giving nicknames to their visitors and to one another. A person had the name given him there stick to it. Now, a name was needed for the followers of the new faith, and the people of Antioch dubbed them Christians. The story shows that Paul and Barnabas had preached themselves but Christ.

The disciples were called Christians, Christ's people, who are like him, and not lost their claim on the great comprehensive family name though they taken on themselves the name of Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians, etc. The story is told that a man named Klein to this country from Germany. He translated his name and called himself "S. S." Later, a brother came over, and he translated his name, calling himself "S. S. S." A third brother afterward and he retained his name without translation. Thus, there were three brothers here bearing different names, but all identical in meaning. They did not record each other's identity under the different names, but when a letter came from many addressed to Mr. Klein, all claimed it. So the promises of Christ for all his people whatsoever name they are known by, if they are of his faith and are like him.

For he was a good man. There was when he saw people rejoicing in Christ, believing in him and turning from their sins, he was glad and would not exult any because of their Gentile birth. Father Taylor was preaching a full Gospel in Boston, he was on friendly terms with other clergymen, some of whom differed with him radically in doctrine. There was one Unitarian clergyman especially with whom Taylor was friendly. With his very decided views seemed strange that Taylor could call a Unitarian a brother, but the good, earnest man did, and evidently felt brotherly toward him. One day a clergyman of the conservative type went to Father Taylor and him rather patronizingly that he advised the work Taylor was doing, and proposed to help him. "Thanks to the Lord," Taylor, "for anyone who is going to us. The clergyman said there was one condition, which was that Taylor should cease to have fellowship with Unitarians. Taylor was disgusted with the exhibition of intolerance. "Doctor said, 'the Unitarians attached no credit to their help, and they do help though we differ. I think, on the whole, I cannot do without them, but I cannot do without you."

THE CITY OF ANTIOCH.

But every man in his own order, "Christ the first-fruits," the root of resurrection; afterwards they are Christ's at his coming, and no mention is made here of the resurrection and shame and everlasting contempt. But the terrible picture of the great white throne and of "the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone, which is the second death," explains this half of Daniel's prophecy. Christ is not the first-fruits of the resurrection to everlasting death, the devil, the beast or antichrist, and the false prophet are the first-fruits of that resurrection. They who depart into everlasting fire inherit the doom prepared for another race, "the devil and his angels." (Matt. 25: 41.)

But Christ is the first-fruits of the resurrection to eternal life, and next in order,

They that are Christ's at his coming." Who are they? "Inasmuch as it is appointed unto men once to die, and after this cometh judgment, so Christ also, having been once offered to bear the sins of many, shall appear a second time apart from sin to them that wait for him unto salvation." (Heb. 9: 27, 28). Who are they that wait for him? How may they be known? The Apostle John thus describes them: "Everyone that hath this hope in him purifieth himself even as he is pure." (1. John 3: 3). They are his, and that wait for him are a people purified like Jesus himself, conformed to the image of God's Son (Rom. 8: 29), "changed into his image from glory to glory, even as appears to have been troubled by this extension. The members of it would evidently have kept Christianity exclusively for Jews, if they could. When the persecution scattered the Christians, they carried the Gospel message with them, but they took it to Jews only. Happily, however, the Jewish Christians who lived outside Palestine, had not the same prejudices, and they preached the Gospel to all who would listen. News soon reached Jerusalem that at Antioch a Church had been organized many of the members of which were not Jews. They were not descendants of Abraham, but Gentiles, heathen, and probably idolaters. The Jewish Christians at Jerusalem were scandalized. They had not been used to associate with Gentiles, and it seemed to them that if these outsiders were to be received into brotherhood, they ought first to become Jews by submission to the Abrahamic rite. Like many people in our own day, they attached great importance to physical rites and ceremonies, having failed to realize how little such things have to do with spiritual regeneration. Some one must be sent to investigate. The choice fell on Barnabas, the large-minded, warm-hearted Jew of Cyprus, who had sold his property and turned it into the common treasury, and who had taken the converted Saul by the hand when the other Christians had treated him coldly and with suspicion. Barnabas was sent to visit the churches where the irregularities had occurred, and especially to look

In a Sailors' Home.

How Many Sea-Wanderers Spend their Shore Leave—A Noble Christian Work.

AMONG the many benevolent organizations of New York, there are few, if any, that have a more far-reaching spiritual and philanthropic influence than those that have undertaken the task of finding for the thousands of wandering sailors who find their way to this seaport. Within a comparatively recent time the seaman, when ashore, was left to his own resources, and often became the prey of a class of "harpies," plundering and vicious persons of both sexes, who preyed upon him between voyages usually at a poor Jack a season of wild dissipation at the expense of money, health and character, and he was fortunate, indeed, if he reached his ship in a condition to fulfill his duties, before she cleared. For a captain has been compelled to turn away from the members of his crew in the port of the city, or in the police station. A few days after the voyage his men, having lost all discipline, and easily led to temptation, would fall into dissipation ashore and squander their hard-earned wages; but he was powerless, having no control over their actions. It was therefore a boon to captains and crews alike when Christian organizations such as the New York Seaman's Society, and the Seaman's Christian Association were established, for these agencies exercised a moral and social influence over the men which has produced the most gratifying results. By furnishing meeting halls, libraries and places for innocent social relaxation, they drew the roving sailors away from the influence of the saloon and the dance-house, while the simple and attractive Gospel services that were held nightly, and the cordial manner in which the wanderers were welcomed and cheered, awoke in their hearts the desire for better and purer pleasures.

Our illustrations on this page afford an idea of the way very many sailors who have come to these happy influences, spend their "shore leave." Instead of going to the rum-shop or the "dive," as formerly, and finding his mates now go straight to the Mission. There they know they will find a warm welcome and pleasant companions, good music and capital reading, recreation for all, and while the ship lies at her dock—a enjoyable Gospel gatherings in the evening. They feel that it is real home life for the wave-worn sailor, and that as they stand by the Mission they are in safe hands. Many have been saved at these sailor missions, and the message of salvation spoken to their hearts has been carried by them to the farthest end of the earth.

The Seaman's Christian Association—whose quarters are shown in the illustration—is incorporated under the Laws of the State of New York, and is now about to complete the tenth year of work among seafaring men and boatmen generally along the river front on the West Side. It is a chapel and reading-room at No. 665 Washington street, on the corner of the Tenth street, where purely evangelical services are held, and Christian fellowship is extended to the sailors. Reading matter and writing materials are furnished without charge. The Mission is used daily by large numbers of the men in the afternoons, and by still larger numbers in the evenings. They love to go there and many of them regard the Mission as their "shore home" where all their wants are cared for. The Mission is non-sectarian, depending entirely upon voluntary contributions and subscriptions. It has no debts, and no compensation whatever is paid to any officer or manager. Every dollar contributed by friends of the Mission and by those having the spiritual and material welfare of the sailors at heart, is expended upon the work itself. It is proposed, if means permit, to enlarge the Mission premises, which are now frequently taxed to their utmost capacity. Visitors are welcome at the Mission daily, afternoons and evenings. Any readers of this journal who are interested in the deserving work, and who wish to know more of this typical Mission home for the wandering sailors, may address the Secretary, Miss E. M. Bangs, No. 665 Washington street, New York, who will gladly supply all information desired.

The Value of Compliments.

There are times when a deserved and well-turned compliment has a value far beyond any other ordinary form of expression. There are people, too, who have the gift of saying the right thing at the

"If each had gone around the world in search of a mate, I think they would have made the choice that heaven made for them. They had lived together more than forty years when I first knew them. I thought then, as I think now, that it was the most perfect wedded life to be found upon earth. They were both of most beautiful presence. He large, fair, with kindly blue eyes and handsome features; she slight, with dark eyes and hair. Both of the sunniest spirit; both free to take their own way, as such fine souls always are, yet their lives were so perfectly one that neither led or followed the other. Mrs. Clemmer, in her reminiscences, tells us that the wonderful union of spirit and action which made the married life of James and Lucretia Mott one long harmony, complete in every part, was not only the mere accident of congenial temperaments coming together in one house, or of two happy tempers acting under one name, but, beyond everything, it was the result of their oneness of moral purpose; their oneness of devotion to what they believed to be right; their oneness of sympathy with the oppressed and wronged everywhere. What a splendid example fancies, or to do only that which he really likes to do. The parent or the teacher must decide what pursuit of activity, or what branch of study, is best for each several child, and must train him to it accordingly.

A Good Rule for the Home.

It is related that a wise mother was in the habit of asking her children, before they retired at night, what they had done during the day to make others happy, found her young twin daughters silent. One of the children spoke modestly of deeds and dispositions founded on the golden rule, "Do unto others as you would that they should do unto you." Still those little bright faces were bowed down in silence. The question was repeated. "I can remember nothing good all this day, dear mother, only one of my school-mates was happy because she had gained the head of the class, and I smiled on her and ran to kiss her; so she said I was good. This is all, dear mother." The other spoke still more timidly: "A little girl who sat by me on the bench at school had lost a little brother. I saw that while she studied her lesson she hid her face in her book and wept. I felt sorry, and laid my face on the same book and wept with her. Then she looked up and was comforted, and put her arms around my neck, but I do not know why she said I had done her good." "Come to my arms, my darlings!" said the mother: "to rejoice with those that rejoice, and weep with those that weep, is to obey our blessed Redeemer."

right time. Others, with the best of intentions, never seem able to do so. They blunder into awkward speeches, and give offense where they mean to give pleasure. Those who know them best understand and gratefully accept their intention; but people less acquainted draw off in annoyance. A very choice instinct is needed in dealing with complimentary speeches. The true compliment is born, not made. It perfectly fits the person to whom it is addressed. We all know people who make us feel in a good humor with ourselves. How they do it we cannot quite tell, but they charm us out of gloom and despondency, without saying that we can specially lay hold of or remember. At certain times such company is most useful to us. We fly to it for cheering and comfort; it soothes and solaces us, pouring oil and balm into our wounds. But some soothing is more due to personal charm than to anything complimentary that may be addressed to us.

A Happy Married Life.

Speaking of the happy married life of James and Lucretia Mott, an Eastern writer has this to say of the famous pair, the story of their home life afforded for young married couples to emulate.

Child Occupations.

There are few, if any children who do not need to be trained to apply themselves earnestly to occupations which they dislike, writes Rev. H. C. Trumbull. The tastes of some children are very good, and of others very poor; but nearly all children have positive inclinations in one direction or in another. They like playing better than working or reading; or they prefer reading or working to playing. Some prefer to remain indoors; others prefer to be outside. Some want to occupy themselves always in mechanical pursuits; others would always be at games of one sort or another. Some enjoy being with companions; others prefer to be by themselves; yet others would attach themselves to one or two persons only, having little care for the society of anybody else. In their studies, children show, perhaps very early, a decided fancy for geography, or history, or mathematics, or the languages, and a pronounced distaste for other branches of learning. Now, whether a child's tastes are elevated

A year ago some time this month, writes Mrs. W. B. T., of Milesburg, Pa., the superintendent of the Junior Endeavors of our little village gave to each of the larger children a penny to invest in something and see how much they could increase it to help raise money to finish our church. My little boy, just a little over six, could not go that day on account of not being well, and was very much hurt that Miss R. did not send him a penny with the other children. So I told him to see how much he could make without a penny. I had taught him to make paper lamp tapers, and suggested that he should make some of them and see if he could sell them. I cut him some strips out of newspapers, and he made them in pack and sold them for three cents; and a friend of his gave him some very pretty colored paper which he sold for five cents a pack, and until the 4th of June he had made $1.10, when the money was taken in for the church. His friends often gave him a few extra pennies and since that has made $1.26, all of which he has given for missions, except the twenty-six cents which he has now sent for the poor starving people of India. He still has a good supply on hand that he is going to sell to give to benevolent purposes.

THE KING'S HIGHWAY

A STORY OF THE BROADER CHRIST-LIFE

WRITTEN SPECIALLY FOR THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

BY AMELIA E. BARR.

"I Must Go and See Jessie."

Alice rose as she said these words. Her face was pale but resolute, and John was confounded and distressed by the attitude she had taken. He was totally unprepared for it. He hardly knew what he had expected, certainly nothing like this tone of accusation, and for a moment he was shaken to the very citadel of his being by the truth as Alice saw it. It is, however, the business of Reason and Experience, to fence off Truth and to defy impressions, and John almost instantly began the process.

Alice, however, was not inclined to prolong the interview, and if John had understood women better he would have seen that she was at that extreme tension, that soon makes the strongest impatient and hysterical. It required all her efforts to preserve the quiet dignity of manner she had assumed. She was impatient to be alone and free to give herself relief from a restraint so painful and exhausting. What he said of excuse and penitence, was hardly comprehended, she only knew that neither of them had dared to touch the real cause of offence—it seemed so shamefully small and unjust—his sensitive knowledge of her dislike to Steve's marriage, and her unreasonable aversion to Steve's wife. They were making a shipwreck of their love, and it was their own fault. There was no storm, it was the little leak in the boat itself that invited destruction, a leak they could easily have stopped, if they would only have recognized its presence.

As it was, John could not prolong so unsatisfactory an interview. He offered her his hand, and she took it, and there were tears in her eyes as she did so. For a moment it lay in his hand, then he bowed his head and kissed it, "Farewell Alice," he said, and with a great sigh he turned and went quickly down the path leading to the gateway. It was all over. Alice as yet hardly realized her suffering, the pang of conflict with it was to come, but as she sat very quiet under the trees, the delicate antennae of the soul began to tell her it was near. John had more hope, for though he felt that a great silence and coldness had fallen over his life, he was an unconscious believer in sequences. He said to himself—"I will not despair. Very few events break off in an absolute way, and threads that are dropped, may be lifted again. She loves me yet. I love her. That we are to be parted forever, is an incredible thing: Destiny is reserving her best gifts, that is all—and I seem to have made mistakes—I have not understood a woman so proud and sensitive—I must think this thing fairly out—doubtless it is my fault. He was silent after this admission for a long time, but finally reached what he believed to be the first right step—

"I must go and see Jessie." Suddenly he remembered Steve, and he asked himself anxiously "what was the matter with Steve?—I must go and see Jessie."

CHAPTER IX.

Ambition and Nicholas Lloyd's Failure.

John was not in the fairest of tempers when he arrived at Jessie's home, and her appearance further irritated him. She had grown physically much handsomer since her marriage, and she dressed herself with consummate taste and effect, but she did not please her brother. There was the same air of insurgent dissatisfaction on her face that there is on the surface of the sea after a passing storm. Her mood explained Steve's mood, and both of them emphatically declared a wrong of some kind; so much so, that John's first remark was—

"What is the matter now, Jessie?"

"Oh, life is such a disappointment, John! Nothing turns out as it promises!"

"Sometimes it turns out better, as it did between you and Steve. Who would have thought he could have furnished you such a lovely home? And what a becoming gown you have on. A remarkably lucky woman I call you."

"I don't know about that. When we are sure things are beyond our means, we do not long for them, any more than we do for Queen Victoria's jewels; but when we see the desire of our heart within our reach, and are prevented from taking it by an unreasonable man, then we are naturally indignant."

"Do you mean Steve? And in what does he prevent your happiness?"

"I want to go into the society Mrs. Stephen Lloyd ought to go into. I want Steve to do what his father wishes him to do. It is all well enough for a man to follow his own vagaries when he is unmarried, but after he has a wife, she ought to be consulted. Steve won't do a single thing I ask him to do."

"Then I am sure you ask very unreasonable things."

"I don't! I don't! I only ask the place he gave me. Fancy Nicholas Lloyd's only son living in a miserable little sixty-dollars-a-month flat! We ought to have a house on the avenue, and a cottage at Newport, don't be a foolish woman, and throw away love for gold. It won't pay you. You will be very wretched."

"If Alice married you, she would be expected to share your poverty. Why then should not I expect to share Steve's riches?"

"Steve is poor. He resigned all right to his father's money, when he refused to assist his father in making and taking care of it. Nicholas Lloyd will leave him nothing; Steve does not expect a cent from him; more, he does not want a cent; more, he has no right to a cent."

"He has. He is Nicholas Lloyd's son."

"There is a right, far greater than birth—the right of obedience and duty. Nicholas Lloyd had the right to expect this duty and obedience in the precise way that seemed good to him. Steve, having come to man's estate and knowledge, had the right to render that duty, and expect the recompense for it; or he had the right to refuse the duty and resign its reward. Steve could not conscientiously do the duty his father asked; he declined to perform it, and he is much too honorable to expect results which he has refused to earn. That is the whole case. Jessie. Steve will never be a rich man through his father. Mrs. Lloyd may leave him a competence. I do not think she will do more. She has already discovered that he does not know the value of money."

"A LUCKY THING FOR HER," SAID JESSIE, SCORNFULLY.

and what is more, I mean to have them."

"Then you will have to have them without Steve. I can tell you that, you ungrateful, unreasonable woman! Do you prefer a fine house to your husband?"

"Nonsense! There is no use talking heroics to me, John. I want my husband in a proper house, that is all. What is the good of money, if you do not do yourself good with it?"

"Money! money! money! I wish I could get out of the sound of the word!"

"You cannot. Life runs to it. If love used to make the world go round, it is money that does it now. Steve ought to have hundreds of thousands of dollars; he might have them if he had a bit of sense, and then he could let me travel and dress and do as I want to do."

"You want hundreds of thousands of dollars to travel and dress and amuse yourself?"

"Yes, I do. I could spend millions comfortably. I want a town-house, a cottage at Newport, a pretty steam-yacht, fast horses, fine stables and carriages and a Parisian modiste."

"Did you tell Steve your ambitions before you married him?"

"My ambitions have grown. They were but scrubby little intentions when I married. Why should we not live as handsomely as Alice Lloyd does?"

"Alice has money of her own. Her mother is very rich. Her father is very rich. You know how poor we are, and how poor we have always been. Jessie,

"Indeed! Do you really acknowledge the value of money? I thought you were among the scorners?"

"I know that money is the grandest of powers. I know its value thoroughly. It is the mammon of righteousness, as well as of unrighteousness."

"For goodness sake, John, don't preach." Then she suddenly stopped, for she heard her husband's step, and her face clouded, and she threw herself backward in her chair with an air of indifference to every earthly thing.

It pained John deeply to mark the change that had come over both husband and wife. There was no hurrying to meet each other, no kiss, no fond inquiries, no haste to bring refreshment and comfort. Jessie preserved her indolent attitude, and kept her eyes on the fine handkerchief, whose lace she plaited and unplaited in her fingers. Steve said only, "Well, Jessie, still in the blues?" and giving John his hand, he sat down by the open window. He looked like a man thoroughly out of temper with life and with all life's duties and belongings.

"John," he said, after a minute's silence, "I am thinking of the mountains—the mountains a long way off—the Rockies. What would I not give to hide myself in their cool solitudes to-day."

"Then why do you not go there, Steve?" asked Jessie, with a provoking and yet alluring nonchalance.

"You may ask that question once too often, Jessie," he answered.

She only laughed mirthfully, as if the covert threat amused her, and in an anxious to turn the wretched conversation, said:

"Your sister will marry Lord Meav I think, Steve. He has renewed his suit and all is now favorable."

"I am very sorry, John."

"A lucky thing for her," said Jessie. "Steve, I intend to go to the wedding. You must manage that for me, at least."

"I shall have nothing to do with the affair, Jessie. It is much against my wish. As to the people who will be present, mother and Alice will decide that matter. I shall not be there."

"I never saw such a family! You sister would not come to your wedding now you are going to pay her back her own coin. That is your Christian I suppose."

"Christianity has nothing to do with it. Alice could not come to our wedding, told you that before. I don't know Medway, and I don't want to know Alice and I understand one another."

"A good thing if you do. I defy one else to make rhyme or reason of either of your actions."

"Can we have dinner, Jessie?"

"I suppose so. Ring for it. Sit down, John."

"I will stay no longer, Jessie. sorry I came here." He arose angrily, clasping Steve's hand, went away with a word to his foolish sister, though heard her crying hysterically before he reached the outer door.

It seemed, then, as if Love was a whether it was successful or unsuccessful, and if so, was it not better to get his appointment before marriage? He felt his own trouble in Steve's, which seemed so much more unnatural; and he himself, at the close of every train of thought, mentally ejaculating, "Poor Steve!"

He did not know what good cause there was for his pity. In the few months that had elapsed since Steve's marriage, Jessie's desires had grown with the digressing celerity that attends the increase of whatever is bad. Indeed, the knowledge of Steve's parentage had the dropping of the evil seed. It lay seen during the first joy of their nuptials but it was full of vitality, and steadily pushing its way to a more active position. Before the honeymoon was over she was contemptuous of all her present surroundings, because her imagination had already furnished far more splendid habitations. She was well aware that these dreams depended for realization on Steve's submission to his father's wild plans, and she was determined that she should submit. She introduced the subject continually. All their confidences and conversations ended in it. There was never a meal eaten that it did not suggest in some form it was present, either in discussion or for silent dissatisfaction. Steve complained of weariness, he was told to take his proper place and work. He spoke of the sorrows of the poor, he visited, he only introduced another phase of the daily quarrel; indeed, the was scarcely a circumstance of life that was not a text from which to preach the same sermon.

Had Steve been an ordinary man, the persistence of attack might have succeeded, but he was not an ordinary man. Had he been cast in the common mold, he would never have closed his ledger and given up his fine financial prospect in order to live the life of simple freedom desired to live. Jessie might have understood from his antecedents, that her husband had a will equal to her own, and that in any contest about a point so vital, she would not find him an easy conqueror. But she had that womanly habit of mind that sees only one side of a question, and the still more womanly habit, of converting all her forces into one form of attack. Jessie saw clearly the social position she desired to occupy; she understood that it must come through Steve's compliance, and all her powers were used to force compliance. He had been complacent on all subjects but this one; here she found all the sweet stratagems that love employs to compass its desires useless. She finally abandoned them and began a course of nagging sarcasms, sullen dissing, or miserable complaining, that would have brought any man of vague character to what she considered a reasonable mission. (To be Continued.)

DEATH CONQUERED.

The Promise of an Endless Life, Surviving Death, and Affording New Plans of Development.

In considering the subject appointed by the Christian Endeavor Committee for the day: "Different kinds of Death and the Conquest of Them," we approach a subject in which every one being has an interest. The path of mortal treads, whether he be rich or poor, cultivated or ignorant, happy or miserable, leads to this one end. Standing before him, near or distant, but unavoidable, is the enemy which remorselessly sweeps every tie which unites him to this world. The blow must fall upon him as he falls on all who have gone before, and whether he is ready to die or whether his work be finished or unfinished, he must quit when the summons comes. But can life go on afterwards?

Is the question which has perplexed philosophers from the beginning. We look upon the remains of our ancestors as they lie insensible in the earth, we are sure that the life with which we have been in contact will never be renewed. Whatever association may have with them in future life, we are under new conditions. No argument is needed to prove that if man is mortal, his immortality does not rest on the body. Death is the end of it. But cannot life continue after death is dead? Is the body essential to the continuance of life? If life is renewed, it must be a life without a body, or a life in a new body. It is the hope that Paul holds out to us in the thirteenth chapter of his first letter to the Corinthians, the last nine verses of which are associated with the Topic. It bids us hope that God will give us a new body, and to every seed its own body. We infer from this, that the resurrection will be specially adapted to the uses of its inmates and will be appropriate to the stage of development which each has attained. It is a mystery. The Apostle admits, but it is conceivable that God may give such a body to the disembodied spirit. The idea is a suggestion and it gives new meaning to much of our present life.

The whole realm beyond the grave is completely hidden from us, and so there are the intimations that the Bible tells about it, that conjecture is necessary based on the analogies our present life affords. Many of them are encouraging. We can conceive of a continuance of life even here. We can imagine an artist delighting in the beauty of nature, and rejoicing in painting on canvas the mountains, forests, and sea sky as they present themselves in varying conditions of light and color. If blindness fell upon such a man he would be dead to all scenes existing about him, but the artistic soul would not be dead. The picture that was in his mind before it was on his canvas, would be in his mind still, and the pictures would come there which his hand had no power to portray. The man who cannot read is dead to the world of literature, but teach him to read and he lives in it. The man who knows nothing about music is dead to the realm of sweet sounds, but when he is instructed, he appreciates the harmony. The man who lives for sensual delight, like the animal, has no pleasures but those of sense, is dead to the beauty of the world and the joys of the Christ-life. Let the Holy Spirit renew his heart, and the man lives in a spiritual sense. Death is conquered. May it not be that at the death of the body the soul will miraculously have new facilities and new organs and instruments of expression? Then, we may be now arranging and preparing for a life of indefinite duration in conditions peculiarly favorable for our development. The very mischief of death does in laying the body in the dust may be emancipation. It may open the gate to a wider, fuller life. The soul that has received life from Christ may stray on expanding in the direction it has taken here, and may continue its path onward unimpeded by the weight of physical proclivities which cripple its progress in this life. It doth not yet appear what we shall be, but faith bids us trust.

EVERY YEAR.

YOU are growing old, they tell us
Every year;
You are more alone, they tell us
Every year;
You can win no new affection,
You have only recollection,
Deeper sorrow and dejection,
Every year.

There come new cares and sorrows
Every year;
Darker days and darker sorrows
Every year;
The ghosts of dead loves haunt us,
The ghosts of changed friends taunt us,
And disappointments daunt us,
Every year.

But the truer life draws nigher
Every year;
And its Morning Star climbs higher
Every year;
Earth's hold on us grows slighter,
And the heavy burden lighter,
And the Dawn Immortal brighter
Every year.

SAVE THAT SOUL.

SOME father's boy, who left the peaceful harbor of his childhood's home,
To brave the perils of the sea, and sport with waves and flying foam,
Had made sad shipwreck of his life, and now is stranded on a shoal,
O, save that boy for God and heaven; save that never-dying soul.

Some mother's darling, in the springtime of her life's bright fragrant bloom, Put out to sea in waters under which there lurked the rocks of doom;
And now her wretched soul is breaking on the reefs of sin and shame,
O, save that girl for God and heaven; save that soul in Jesus' name.

Away from father's home and watchcare; far from mother's counsel true,
A host of precious youths are drifting into perils hid from view,
O, warn them what they hazard with no compass, pilot safe, or chart,
O, save those souls for God and heaven; save by every sacred art.

ARMAGEDDON.

The Future Conflict of the Nations Identified in Prophecy and its Issue Described.

BY REV. CAPEL MOLYNEUX.

THE battle of Armageddon is closely connected with Israel's future history; so much so as to institute the climax of the period emphatically described as the time of Jacob's trouble.

The battle is plainly predicted in several passages of Scripture, notably Ezekiel 38; 39; 40; 41; Jer. 4: 6, 7; Joel 3; and Zech. 14. A difficulty, however, is felt by some in distinguishing between this battle and others made mention of in Scripture. For instance, a battle or siege is predicted in Luke 21: 20. Again, another battle is predicted in Rev. 20: 8, 9, to occur at the close of the Millennium. And there is the battle in Rev. 16. Now, the battle predicted in Luke, is certainly the siege of Jerusalem under Titus, and cannot be confounded with that to occur at the close of the Millennium, foretold in Rev. 20: the distinction between these is perfectly evident. But the question is, whether the battle foretold in Rev. 16, is not identical with one or other of these, or whether it is distinct from and unconnected with both.

At the siege under Titus he was completely victorious, and Israel completely vanquished and dispersed, even to the present day: while at Armageddon, on the contrary, while the enemy of Israel may conquer for the moment (as appears from Zech. 14: 2), yet shall it be only for a moment, the Lord quickly appears to fight for Israel, and the enemy then is utterly destroyed. Nothing can be more decisive or absolute than the distinction. In one case the interposition of the Lord, in a providential form, is wholly against Israel; in the other the interposition of the Lord, in a personal form, is wholly in Israel's favor—to confound these is manifestly impossible. This, surely, is enough to distinguish between these sieges. Clearly, then, this battle of Armageddon is quite distinct from that in Rev. 20, as much so as it is in Luke 21.

The particular moment of time, too, when Armageddon is pre-ordained to occur, is very remarkable, as contrasted with both these other battles. Unlike the siege under Titus, it occurs, not at the beginning but at the end of Israel's tribulation; while unlike the siege in Rev. 20, it occurs, not at the end but at the beginning of the Millennial age. It occurs, in short, just between the other two, and at that particular point of time when Israel's troubles close, and the time of blessedness is about to begin.

In regard to this battle it must be further noticed, that it is, when fully viewed, divisible into two parts, or acts. The first relates to the assault of Antichrist and the nations, on Israel at Jerusalem: the second to the assault of Christ, and the host of heaven conquering Antichrist and the nations. These parts or acts, essentially distinct as they are, are often confounded, and great perplexity and error in the interpretation of prophecy is the result though, indeed, such confusion is not greatly to be wondered at, in view of the prophetic figures.

Again, God has another object in the battle, even in reference to the nations who shall be gathered together and engaged therein. It is designed for their final destruction, as well as primarily for the chastisement and judgment of Israel.

The immediate results of the battle will, of course, precisely accord with God's purposes in permitting the battle, the results will show the fulfilment of those purposes, and will therefore be:

First: A terrible destruction of many of Israel in the city and in the land, even two-thirds of the whole. "And it shall come to pass, that in all the land, saith the Lord, two parts therein shall be cut off and die, but the third part shall be left therein." (Zech. 13: 8.)

Secondly: The deep humiliation, repentance, and purification of the remnant of the "one-third" who are spared and brought through the fire; and who receive the Lord at his coming with joy and gladness, and are subsequently commissioned to go forth and proclaim his name and glory to the isles and nations afar off. (Isaiah 66.)

CHAMPION SUNDAY SCHOLARS.

The Records Still Coming In—One Aged Pupil Who Claims Sixty-five Years of Attendance—How the Contest Progresses.

EVERY week brings new and interesting developments in the Sunday School Championship Contest. Some of the records that are produced are indeed astonishing, and must be as much of a surprise to pastors and superintendents as to anybody. The friendly competition continues to arouse interest in every part of the United States, and some of the letters received tell us of records of many years of faithful attendance, which are the more wonderful when we bring to mind the obstacles that must have been overcome and the storms battled against to keep them perfect.

Mr. George H. Glasgow, of Rochester, N. Y., (whose photograph was published in these columns several weeks ago), has an interesting history. He is a leading contestant for the championship honors. He commenced his regular attendance in the infant department of the Central Presbyterian Sunday School of Rochester, N. Y., January 1, 1867, and up to February 1, 1897, has the magnificent record of thirty years—1560 consecutive attendances—without a break. In 1872, Mr. Glasgow visited England, being gone ten weeks, and knowing the importance of keeping his record intact, he attended a Bible class on the steamer, both going and once in fifteen years. Everett Schaefe, Newark, N. J., has attended the First Reformed S. S. for seven years and eleven weeks without a miss. Sophie McEwen, Hubersburg, Pa., has attended the Hubersburg U. S. S. for fifty-four years, missing only a few Sabbaths. Miss Laura Davie, New Dorp, S. I., has attended the New Dorp Moravian S. S. for five years and fourteen weeks, up to March 21, 1897.

Mr. George Taylor, Washington, Ky., writes: "I wish to tell you of a little girl who went to Sunday School when she was five years old, for the whole year; sometimes she was so sick that she had to be carried, and leaned on her teacher while there. She would under no consideration miss attending. Her name is Hattie L. Taylor."

A very remarkable family record comes from Fall River, Mass. Miss Mary E. Slinn began her Sunday School attendance when she was three years of age, and has not been absent a single Sabbath for seventeen years and twenty-three weeks. Her sister, Miss Lavinia Slinn, has a record of twelve years without a miss, and a brother, Joseph K. Slinn, has eleven years perfect attendance to his credit. Photographs of these pupils were recently published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. As a testimonial of appreciation of their faithful attendance, a Bible was presented to the sisters in 1890, with the indeed, could be more tragic than the petrified bodies found in the positions in which they were overwhelmed; or more realistic than the ruts made in the paving-stones by hurrying chariot-wheels; and the hollows worn at the fountain by the hands of many, while leaning there to quench their thirst; or more pathetic than the marble bust of a councillor standing intact in his own well-appointed vestibule? With sorrowful wonder we turned up this street and that, visited the baths, the theatre, the Street of the Tombs, and last of all, the museum. The latest excavation, completed eight months ago, revealed the finest of all houses as yet laid bare. In the garden-court, around which the house is built, are beautiful fountains and statuettes of marble (than which no finer are to be found in Europe), the whole having been in some measure restored, and the garden planted, to reproduce, as far as possible, its original appearance. At every turn one met evidence of high civilization, which suggested how little, in the last 2,000 years, the world has advanced in either its arts or ingenuities.

Evangelism on the Border.

Any reader of this journal who is willing to be instrumental in assisting the evangelistic work on our southern border (fully described in our issue of March 10, page 186), can do so by addressing E. returning, and went to Sabbath School while in England. The faithfulness of this scholar has been fully appreciated by his Sunday School companions, who have at different times presented him with handsome testimonials.

A very interesting record is that of Miss Sallie Benton, of the First M. E. Sunday School, Peoria, Ill., who has attended Sunday School for thirty-three years from 1863 to February 1, 1897, with only two following verse inscribed upon the fly-leaf:

"E'en as thou hast long been faithful,
Strive to ever faithful prove;
Love thy God and love thy neighbor,
In the path of duty move.
Never absent from thy place,
Ne'er found wanting in God's grace."

This letter tells of a remarkable Sunday School record:

Granite, Md. Mrs. Sarah Spicer has been a continuous member of the Granite Presbyterian S. S. for 65 years, making a total of 3120 Sundays. She has also been an active member of said church, and is now 76 years of age. Unto better informed we claim the Championship. ANDREW M. KIRKPATRICK, Sup't.

We have written to inquire further as to this record, which, if fully authenticated, would seem to eclipse all others. There should be a very interesting story connected with Mrs. Spicer's Sunday School experience.

Miss Florence Bitzer has a record of uninterrupted attendance for a period of eight years at St. Matthew's Lutheran S. S., of Schuylkill Haven, Pa.

Miss Theresa L. Scott has been an attendant of the First Presbyterian Church S. S. for nine years with only one absence.

On this page we give the new entries for the week. The entries in the present contest will close on June 1st.

A Painful Humor

On the Ankle Spread to the Knee and Developed into Boils -- No Trouble Since Taking Hood's.

"I was troubled with a disagreeable itching on one of my ankles. In time it developed into boils of which I had five or six at a time. The humor spread from my ankle to my knee and was very painful. It baffled the skill of physicians. For weeks I could not bear my weight on this foot. An abscess formed and was lanced and the humor broke out on my other ankle and threatened to repeat my former experience. Hood's Sarsaparilla attracted my attention and I began taking it. In six weeks I was better, and began to hope for a permanent cure. I took Hood's Sarsaparilla six months and was entirely cured. I have had no trouble with humor since that time." MRS. M. B. Mrs. Armenian Massacres.

As was foreshadowed in a recent issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the Cretan troubles have been the cause of stirring up dangerous agitation in Asia, and the Turks have seized upon the helpless Armenians. At the town of Tokat, in the Sivas district, a great massacre took place, in which hundreds of Armenians were killed. They were attacked by the Turks while at prayer, and cruelly slaughtered. For five days the attack continued, and many Armenian houses and shops were looted. The excitement. In consequence of the ever remembrance by the British Ambassador at Constantinople, the Sultan ordered the dismissal and arrest of the officials and the appointment of a British Commission to try them. The latest outrage has naturally caused great consternation among the Armenians, and it is feared that other massacres will follow. Strange New Shrub that Cures Kidney and Bladder Diseases, Rheumatism, etc. Free.

Have previously described the new botanic remedy, Alkavis, which proves a specific cure for diseases caused by Uric acid in the blood, or disorders of the kidneys or urinary organs. It is now stated that Alkavis is a product of the well known Kava-Kava Shrub, and is a specific cure for these diseases just as quinine is for malaria. Dr. R. C. Wood, of Lowell, Ind., writes that after weeks Alkavis cured him of Kidney and Bladder disease of ten years' standing, and Rev. J. M. Owen, of West Pawlet, Vt., gives similar testimony. Many ladies also testify to its wonderful curative powers in disorders peculiar to womanhood. The only importers of Alkavis so far are Church Kidney Cure Co., of 418 Fourth Avenue, New York, and they are so anxious to show the value that for the sake of introduction they will send a free treatment of Alkavis prepaid by mail to every reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who is a sufferer from any form of Kidney or Bladder disease, Bright's Disease, Rheumatism, Dropsy, gravel, Pain in Back, Female Complaints, or any ailment due to improper action of the Kidney or Urinary Organs. We advise all sufferers to send their names and address to the company, and receive the Alkavis free. It is sent to you entirely free, to prove its wonderful curative power.

RESURRECTION POWER.

What is resurrection power? In one of his most thrilling stories, a famous author describes an effort that was made to restrain the wilder excesses of the Revolution in France in 1792. A man who had been snatched from his home and his beloved wife and child and immured in the living grave of the Bastille for many years until he lost his reason, was restored to liberty and recovered his senses. When he heard that vengeance had overtaken the nobles, and that a descendant of the very man who had caused his imprisonment was in danger of perishing, and that the mob were intent on destroying all the class that had perpetrated such outrages, he went to Paris, believing that a man who had suffered as he had would exercise a potent influence. He thought that even the fiercest revolutionist would listen to a released Bastille prisoner, and thus he would have a power derived from his sufferings that nothing else could have given him. He could be a powerful advocate before the revolutionary tribunal for any prisoner who appealed to him for help. All whom he might save in this way from the guillotine would know the power of his suffering. We can imagine a man thus saved from death leading a very different life afterward from that he would have lived if he had never been in peril and been delivered. It is so that at this distance of time there is power in Christ's resurrection. It was this power that in the passage on which the Topic is based (Phil. 3: 10, 11) Paul wanted to know. The saved soul becomes a consecrated soul. He has not only a hope of his own resurrection, but he leads a new life here and now. He rises out of the mire of sin and selfishness a new man.

the expression universally applied to the condition in which spring commonly finds us, — when we are without energy, without appetite, and without strength. The figure of speech implies that we need something to set us going again. The uncoiled mainspring will not coil itself; the watch must be wound. To the watch there must be a key; a key made to fit the watch. The human stem is like the watch, it won't wind itself. The mainspring of this system is the blood — "for the blood is the life," and to re-coil that mainspring, to put it to it anew the power that moves and works, there must be an equivalent to a watch-key. What the "run-down" stem needs in the spring is that there shall be put back into the blood the vital elements that have been taken out of it. You can do that, or you can take a long rest; do nothing but loaf, diet yourself, and take proper exercise. You can do

Ayer's Sarsaparilla is a scientifically prepared medicine, designed to accomplish for the system just what the key does for the watch, just what the fertilizer does for the soil; give back, in concentrated form, and quickly, the elements of which the blood has been depleted. Remember, this applies to Ayer's Sarsaparilla in especial. For no other sarsaparilla is either so scientifically prepared or has such remedial power. Don't be deceived by the use of the name "sarsaparilla." There is a sound saying of a good book that runs in this wise: "Salt is good. But if the salt hath lost its savor, wherewith shall it be salted? It is good for nothing but to be cast out." In other words, salt is not salt because of its name, but because of its nature. There are some thirteen varieties of sarsaparilla, and of these only one is of recognized medical value. That one variety grows in Honduras, C. A., and the J. C. Ayer Sarsaparilla is the only sarsaparilla that is made exclusively from this Honduran growth of sarsaparilla. Get Ayer's Sarsaparilla.

But it would not cost you so much to buy it. You'd get a discount from the list—perhaps a discount of one half, making the music cost you $8.60, which added to the price of the chart, $10.00, makes $9.60. We offer you the Book and Chart

Be sure to mention the name of this paper, in writing for the music book.

AT LESS THAN COST DO NOT NEGLECT THIS RARE OPPORTUNITY.

For more than two years the best energies of our special educational staff of over 200 well-known scientific writers have been concentrated on the preparation of the important American publication of modern times—one that even now is recognized throughout the educational world as a fitting culmination of nineteenth century science and literature. It combines all the essential features of a complete general Encyclopedia, a Pronouncing Dictionary, a Library of Biography, and a Gazetteer of the World, all based upon the latest reports and statistics available up to March 15, 1897. Our plan involves the treatment, in condensed encyclopedic form, of the whole range of human knowledge, with special attention to the new subjects that have been developed during this last decade of marvellous scientific progress and research. This great, new work stands absolutely alone in its treatment of the live subjects of our wonderful to-day. Space forbids even a partial enumeration of the practical, brain-developing features of this matchless work, which may be truly pronounced an absolute necessity to every man, woman and child who covets knowledge. We can simply guarantee its vast superiority over every other reference work in print. It is an ideal, up-to-date combination of

AN ENCYCLOPÆDIA

It is absolutely the latest in print. All the editorial work has been done within the past two years—more than half since September, 1896. Such wonderful rapidity was made possible by a multitude of workers, and superb organization. As a result, our pages treat scores of topics not even mentioned elsewhere,—the very ones in which you are interested.

A DICTIONARY

Very few people have a vocabulary exceeding 20,000 words. Some less than 1,000. There are about 150,000 dictionary terms in The American Educator, spelled, defined and pronounced correctly, with copious etymologies where needed. 10,000 derivatives, questionable compounds, and "freak" words of all kinds are omitted.

A BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY

Biographies of living men are an important feature. You can find the biography of Julius Cæsar in almost any old work, but what about the new men of mark—the glories of the future? We have them, and the old ones, too.

A GAZETTEER

The latest official and special information regarding empires, countries, states, territories, counties, cities, towns, villages, rivers, rivers, lakes, oceans and mountains. Fully 30,000 special estimates of 1897, populations, &c., by local officials and reporters. No other Gazetteer compares with this.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

J. A. W., Mt. Hamill, Ia. 1. What is the Bowerly? 2. Is it wrong for Christians to attend county agricultural fairs, where there is horse-racing? 3. Is it wrong for a minister to spend days in the game of foot-ball when he has to go a distance to engage in them?

1. It is a leading East-side thoroughfare in New York City, full of cheap stores and tenements, and long celebrated as the resort of the vicious and the criminal classes. 2. No real Christian will patronize horse-racing. 3. A minister may enjoy exercise in moderation, but it is well to remember, even though there may be nothing wrong in certain kinds of recreation in themselves, that such an one cannot afford to forget that there is a dignity and respect connected with his calling which may easily be sacrificed by such a course as you describe. It would certainly impair a pastor's usefulness, if it did not destroy his spiritual influence altogether.

F. E. P., Holly, N. Y. Which is doing the more good to help India, America or England?

Both countries are doing all they can. The relief movement began earlier in England, as was to have been expected, but our own people are now doing magnificently, as usual.

Olympic, Tenn. 1. If a Christian has given up dancing, card-playing and like amusements, is it wrong to indulge, once in awhile among select and intimate friends? 2. When men are obliged to work all the Sabbath-day to accommodate Christians, and non-Christians, and have themselves no opportunity of getting to church—if they are not connected, is not the Christian who helps to employ them partly responsible? I refer to the cars.

1. We do not think he is justified, at any time, in disregarding the voice of conscience. The amusements you enumerate are a distinct hindrance to spiritual growth. They have been a step to ruin for thousands, and never helped one. 2. Of course they are partly responsible. The best thing to do is to seek other employment where the objection does not exist.

Chas. G. R., Bullock, N. C. Was Paul a Jew or a Gentile?

He was of Jewish descent, of the tribe of Benjamin (see Phil. 3: 5), and inherited from his father the rights of Roman citizenship.

A reader, Mr. E. J. Roberts, Augusta, Me., sends us the following Biblical arraignment of spiritualism, which will interest many who have written us on the subject:

Lev. 23: 27; 19: 31 clearly show that the Lord forbids his people to follow after familiar spirits. At the end of forty years Moses again warns the people against spiritualism in all its forms, Deut. 18: 10, 11. One of the Kings of Israel did practice it and it provoked the Lord. 11. Chron. 33: 6. Micah, the prophet, bore a message against this evil. Micah 5: 12. Also the prophet Isaiah, Isa. 47: 12, 13. Acts 8: 9, 10 mentions a sorcerer who was thought to be the power of God, but in fact proved to be a power of Satan. A similar case is reported in Acts 13: 9, 10.

E. G. H., Ironton, O. What other gift was with the township of land in Florida, given to Marquis de Lafayette by the Congress of 1824 on his visit to the United States?

Congress voted him $200,000 and the Florida township.

Susie E. Quick, Lake City, Mich., writes:

Last year the fleets of Europe lay in the Bosphorus and yet the butchering went on. Is Europe afraid of offending the Turks? Or does she value her opium trade more than the lives of Christians? God himself has said, "Whoso sheddeth man's blood by man shall his blood be shed." And what right have the nations of the earth to disregard the Divine command? What right have they to enter into a treaty that will shield the Turks, while they allow the murderous work to go on unchecked? Will not God avenge himself on those nations who are so derelict in duty? We women of America only wish the Monroe Doctrine did not restrain our government from sending an army to aid in the full overthrow of Turkish rule.

Subscriber, Midletown, Conn. Will you answer through the columns of the MAIL-BAG, where I live and He is not rich who lays up much, but he who lays out much. And verily to lay out lavishly for God in this life is to lay up abundant treasure in the life to come?

Some of our readers may possibly be able to furnish the information needed.

Here is a letter which carries with it an inspiration to all who have a spark of sympathy in their breasts for suffering India. It is from Rev. Thos. Marshall, D.D., Field Secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, a man whose whole life has been described as "a romance of Christian modesty and moral heroism."

"Chicago, Ill., March 25, 1897. I wish to contribute to the Famine Fund for the India sufferers. Herewith I send you my check for five dollars. I wish I could send more, for I have been in that country and can easily judge of the distress of men, women and helpless little children, who are dying for the lack of bread, of which we have such an abundance, and too often eat and waste without a thought or a care for those who are dying for the lack of that which we could give, and be the richer for the giving. May God have mercy upon the suffering and cause that these afflictions and sorrows may redound to the glory of his name by opening still wider the door of the Gospel of his Son, our Saviour."

W. P. D., Blue Springs, Miss. 1. What was the Copernican system? 2. Is it right for a Christian boy to play baseball? 3. Where can I get a good Bible Dictionary? Who was Queen Victoria's husband?

1. The system of astronomy taught by Nicolaus Copernicus of Prussia in the sixteenth century, the essential feature being expounded in his book called "The Revelation of the Celestial Orbs," upon which he labored 21 years. 2. Yes. 3. Write to any good publisher. 4. Prince Albert of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha.

J. R. Bowerman, Honeoye Falls, N. Y., writes:

Would there be any way of forwarding food to

THE CATTLE MARKET AT QUIMPER, BRITANNY.

Formerly a French town of importance, Quimper has been left somewhat behind in the march of progress. It has a fine cathedral, dedicated to St. Corentin, and several other buildings of note. The cattle market is one of the periodical occasions of interest in the community.

the perishing people of India such as different kinds of grain and vegetables if they were donated for that purpose? It would seem that quite an amount might be collected in grains, salt meat, etc. Could it be conveyed to them free of charge?

The only available contribution of food for India could be in the form of old corn. Meat and perishable vegetables are out of the question. No Hindoo eats meat. See whether a car of corn, in sacks, cannot be gathered in your neighborhood, each person giving what he can.

Subscriber, Toronto, Can. When a husband does not seem to have any inclination to join in family worship, is it proper for the wife who is anxious that her young children should be led to Christ, to lead while the husband and father is engaged in reading the newspaper and smoking? What is the best means to induce him to be interested?

Yours is a very common experience. By prayer and perseverance you may finally overcome his indifference and get him to unite with you in worship. Perhaps your pastor might be able to aid you in bringing this about. Kindness rather than reproaches may prove effective. Let the older children ask him to join, and the barrier once broken, he would have no hesitation afterward. It is only a beginning that is needed.

The following plea from an army chaplain should meet a warm response at the hands of many readers.

Fort Sherman, Idaho. I have recently been transferred to this post and find myself with very little of any kind of literature suitable for use in barracks, hospital and guard house. I write to ask for good clean book numbers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. If one will send one or more numbers to our reading room for a year, he will render a good service. If individuals send book numbers, they should be in excellent condition, free from soiled spots, etc. I am practically empty-handed in beginning my work, and as I never in the past applied to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in vain, I feel sure help will come. C. C. Bateman, Chaplain, U. S. Army.

L. M. N., Bellefontaine, Pa. What is your opinion of the good old hymn, "Nearer My God to Thee," and "There is a Fountain Filled with Blood," sung to an operatic air in such a tragic way you can scarcely distinguish a word, and sung by those who frequent public dancing-halls and euchre parties at night, and stand up before a congregation as Christians in a Christian Church?

There is a trace of bitterness in your question, but we quite agree with you that such singing, no matter how "artistic" the performance, is unsuited to Church services and not likely to be appreciated by a majority of the worshippers. An occasional solo, however, is admissible and may be rendered in freer style than the congregational music.

This letter from a well-known pastor, who has the cause of suffering India very warmly at heart will be read with interest:

"DEAR CHRISTIAN HERALD. I cannot restrain myself from saying how much I admire the splendid courage and Christ-like spirit of your heroic work for the starving millions of India. I am inviting my western friends to seize this opportunity of lending their corn to the Lord. God bless you in this great work, and bring to your aid great souls in pulpit and pew all over the land! Ever yours, LOUIS ALBERT BANKS."

We commend the practical course of Rev. Dr. Banks to other pastors. Let them arouse sympathy everywhere in India's behalf now, and they will soon discover how enthusiastically their people will be to forward so glorious a work. The cry of India for help should be sounded from every pulpit in the land.

Mrs. Thos. S., Cobden, Ill. Are all the illustrations representing the poor in India taken from life? Emaciated forms are so ghastly, I think they should not be printed, unless taken from actual life.

They are taken from life. In the early stages of the present famine, our correspondent in Calcutta, Mr. Aitken (a journalist and evangelist) went inland to the famine districts at would grow out of his work as he initiates Matt. 16: 18 and other passages. A number of Christians multiplied and views of divine truth manifested the Christians of the same view naturally associated themselves together. Each contention that it was the organ most in accord with Christ's concept the members did not honestly and believe that they would have no reasonable corporate existence. But they have to contend for exclusive possession truth. That would be an arrogant assumption. Christ does not deal with the mass the individual. No man is saved by ing to a church, but by being born Christianity is life not form, or rite, money. Life takes varied forms and, thian is justified in entering the church suits his spiritual life and tends to its ment. All that is required of him is Christ. Christ did not prescribe the any book except the Bible.

E. B., Plankinton, S. D. 1. If, as I believe, thing in the life of God's children is arranged of God how could Paul tribute a hindrance to Satan as in 2: 18? 2. Is it the duty of a Christian to accede to the request of a pastor to testify in public?

1. Paul in common with the people time had a firm belief in the inter Satanic influence in human life. Not the passage you quote, but in II. C. he refers to it. The "thorn in the flesh" ever that affliction was, he regarded a senger from Satan. The writer of took another view. He said the evil that troubled Saul was from the Lord. Samuel 16: 14; 18: 10 and other p. The writer of the book of Job thought the evil fortune might be the work of under express permission of God. "If of evil has always been a mystery and solved yet. Though we cannot under we may be sure that vexations a drances and temptations, do not con without the divine permission, and intended to strengthen the character himself said that all things work together good to them that love God. (Rom. 2. The pastor should have the support of his members, but there are times a member may be justified in declining word of explanation to the pastor in before the meeting might save both from embarrassment.

M. J. K., Hanover, Pa. How do you just answer as to the religious teaching schools, in view of the opinion of many men who hold that there ought to be teaching in the public schools?

We do not justify it. Every man is to his own opinion. Our correspondent for our opinion and we gave it. must be taken for what it is worth. The BAG could not answer its purpose if it fended our opinions in it against those not agree with them. In spite of the nence of the authority you quote, we that the State is unfit to be a religious and, if we had children of our own in the schools, we should most strenuously to having them taught religion there; as we believe if the State were policed side what character of religious it should be given, the decision would form, which in our opinion is a most pe error. Let the State keep its hands occupation for which it has no capacity.

Reader. Why was the peacock a symbol of the resurrection?

It was regarded as sacred to the goddess Juno. A writer says: "It was the universal belief of the Old World that the peacock annually lost and renewed its plumage; shedding its feathers in Winter, only to attire itself in plumage of a more brilliant hue in the Spring-time; and again, that its flesh after death was incorruptible. These beliefs naturally led to its use as a symbol of resurrection and immortality."

Josephine, Richmond, Ind. The members of a certain church claim that theirs is the church founded and established by Christ and that no other is justified in making the claim. Have they any Scriptural authority for the claim or for the books they use?

ON THE BALKAN WAR LINE.

Europe Watching the Hostile Armies of Turkey and Greece — The Balkan Peoples—Russia's Influence in the Crisis.

BALKAN SOLDIER.

PEACE seems to have fled from Europe, for a time, at least, and the eyes of the Old World are now directed toward the Balkans, where the armies of Turkey and Greece confront each other in hostile attitude. With 90,000 Greek troops under Prince Constantine in Thessaly, with headquarters at Larissa, and a force of nearly 150,000 Turks stationed advantageously at different points on the opposite frontier, with headquarters at Ellassona, the prospect of peace is certainly not reassuring. Moreover, the preparations of the two nations conspires look to Russia as the real arbiter of the situation, and whose wishes must govern the action of Montenegro, Servia, Bulgaria and Roumania in the final event. All correspondents unite in declaring that war seems to be imminent. In the Greek army there is a martial spirit not to be mistaken, and the people are so clamorous for war, that should a compromise now be reached, the throne would be in serious danger. Larissa, the headquarters on the frontier, has, besides its own population, nearly sixty thousand infantry, cavalry and artillery. Great preparations have evidently been made for the expected campaign and the war supplies and commissariat are all that could be wished. Even the frontier roads have been put in good condition to facilitate the movements of troops. Pontoon bridges have been thrown across the streams, and a complete telegraph and electric searchlight system for field uses has been constructed. Across the frontier on the mountain slopes, can be seen the tents of the Turk-sacks, Albanians, Circassians, Russians, Bulgarians, Turks and Greeks, with a good sprinkling of Western Europeans as well.

Some of the types involved are shown in the photographs on this page. Ordinarily, representatives of all these different races, who are now facing each other in deadly hostility, may be seen in Constantinople in amicable relations, but the approach of war has effected a sudden transformation.

A well-known writer and traveler, Emma Paddock Telford, who has a very wide acquaintance among the people of Eastern Europe, has written this interesting description of some of these races for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

"Among the 150,000 people under whose footsteps Constantinople Bridge sways from morning until night, and whose varied costumes produce a kaleidoscopic effect of brilliant color and constantly shifting form, may be found representatives of all nations; the descendants of Shem, Ham and Japheth, starting from one parent stock. With the first glimmer of coming dawn, the stir of life that so soon broadens into a veritable maelstrom of humanity, makes itself manifest. Upon the boats, the Turkish boatmen rub their eyes, give themselves a shake and are wide-awake and on the alert, getting the steamers ready to go to the different villages for the first contingent of early passengers. The cafis of the boats prepare their steaming coffee over the charcoal braziers in the little cabins near the wheel. Engineers and captains snatch a cup of the fragrant beverage; the 'look-out' takes his place at the bow ready to raise his voice in the sonorous cry of 'Varda!' 'Varda!' (look out), that marks the passage; the whistle sounds shrilly, and the business of the day is well begun. Among the pedestrians on the bridge man with her black-eyed baby peering from a bag on her back, an Albanian 'Mohalibedji' with his tempting tray of 'Mohalibi' covered with a clean wet cloth and surrounded with ranks of gaily-colored saucers and bright, arrow-shaped spoons, a begging Dervish, bare-footed, ragged, a white deer-skin on his shoulders, beads hanging from his neck and surrounded by a pack of hungry, wolfish dogs. Perhaps the most striking figures in the crowd are a band of low-browed, wild-eyed Circassians in bear-skin caps, with daggers at their belts and silver cartridges on their breasts. These have just disembarked, having with them a group of beautiful, dark-eyed Circassian girls, to be sold as slaves at the palace. Here in contrast comes an Armenian wedding, the singing boys ahead in white gowns and with candles in their hands. Just behind them the priest chanting 'Hallelujah,' with incense burning in his hand as he beats time with it to the stately march. Behind the priest are the parties most interested, two cheerful, smiling faces, the bride and groom. Next a procession of schoolboys, chanting merrily, on their way from school, from their open Arabic prayer-books, while all devout Mohammedans as they pass cry 'Amen amen.'"

But just at the present moment not only Constantinople Bridge, but all Turkey is in turmoil. While the rival armies are facing each other on the border and apparently eager for the signal for war, Europe's rulers and cabinets are playing at cross purposes. England has over sixty warships in the Levant, but she gives only a half-hearted co-operation to the other powers, the impotency of whose concert does been strikingly illustrated by the failure to effect any adjustment of the troubles in Crete. Still, if we may judge by the action of the powers in Crete as a whole, it seems probable that Greece will find itself embarrassed by them on every side in a Balkan war. A real blockade of the Aegean Sea—a thing well-nigh impossible without the energetic co-operation of England—might result in depriving brave little Greece of its strongest weapon, its navy, and making the issue of the conflict between the armies extremely doubtful. Greek valor and enthusiasm may count for much, however, and the civilized peoples of all lands are in strong sympathy with the heroic nation which, in the face of all opposition, has espoused the cause of the persecuted Christians of Crete, and flung down the gauntlet to the "Assassin of Europe," Abdul Hamid, and his murderous Moslem hordes.

Filling the Corn Ships.

All over the land, Christian men and women are working energetically to fill the corn ships. Congress has just granted to carry our gifts to starving India. You, too, should have a share in the work, which is rich with blessing for all concerned. Send your gift in corn, or the money to buy it, to the India Famine Relief Fund, 92 Bible House, New York.

one sees a Maltese dealer in straw hats and sponges, a French monsieur with clothes in the latest Parisian fashion, a Herzegovinian in dark red fez, sash and sandals — a wild-looking gypsy woman, who have thrown up earth works and stone-works. In the neighborhood of the two armies, the natives are all armed and watchful of events. Already the Albanians have begun their lawless raiding into Turkish territory, but their depredations have been checked by the troops after some sharp encounters. On the Turkish line may be seen squadrons of the splendid cavalry which in past years was the pride of the Sultan's army. Strange-looking, bearded Circassians, heavy-coated, high-hatted, and with their belts full of knives, pistols and cartridges, are among the troops. A NATION AT PRAYER.

Sermon by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., on the Text: 1. Timothy 2:1: -

I exhort therefore, that, first of all, supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks, be made for all men: for kings, and for all that are in authority.

HAT which London is to England, Paris to France, Berlin to Germany, Rome to Italy, Vienna to Austria, St. Petersburg to Russia, Washington is to the United States Republic. The people who live here see more of the chief men of the nation than any who live anywhere else between Atlantic and Pacific oceans. If a Senator, or Member of the House of Representatives, or Supreme Court Justice, or Secretary of the Cabinet, or representative of foreign nation enters a public assembly in any other city, his coming and going are remarked upon and unusual deference is paid to him. In this capital there are so many political chieftains in our churches, our streets, our halls, that their coming and going make no excitement. The Swiss seldom look up to the Matterhorn, or Jungfrau, or Mt. Blanc, because those people are used to the Alps. So we at this capital are so accustomed to walk among mountains of official and political eminence that they are not to us a great novelty. Morning, noon, and night we meet the giants. But there is no place on earth where the importance of the Pauline injunction to prayer for those in eminent place ought to be better appreciated. At this time, when our public men have before them the rescue of our National Treasury from appalling deficits, and the Cuban question, and the Arbitration question, and in many Departments men are taking important positions which are to them new and untried, I would like to quote my text with a whole tonnage of emphasis—words written by the scarred missionary to the young theologian Timothy: "I exhort, therefore, that, first of all, supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks, be made for all men; for kings, and for all that are in authority."

If I have the time, and do not forget some of them, before I get through I will give you four or five reasons why the people of the United States ought to make earnest and continuous prayer for those in eminent place.

First, because that will put us in proper attitude toward the successful men of the nation. After you have prayed for a man you will do him justice. There is a bad streak in human nature that demands us to assail those that are more successful than ourselves. It shows itself in boyhood, when the lads, all running to get their ride on the back of a carriage, and one gets on, those failing to get on shout to the driver, "Cut behind!" Unsuccessful men seldom like those who in any department are successful. The cry is, "He is a political accident," or "He bought his way up," or "It just happened so," and there is an impatient waiting for him to come down more rapidly than he went up. The best cure for such envy is prayer. After we have risen from our knees we will be wishing for official good instead of evil. We will be hoping for him benediction rather than malédiction. If he makes a mistake we will call it a mistake instead of malfeasance in office. And, oh! how much happier we will be; for wishing one evil is diabolic, but wishing one good is saintly, is angelic, is God-like. When the Lord drops a man into depths beyond which there is no lower depth, he allows him to be put on an investigating committee with the one hope of finding something wrong. In general assemblies of the Presbyterian Church, in conferences of the Methodist Church, in conventions of the Episcopal Church, in House of Representatives, and in Senate of United States there are men always glad to be appointed on the Committee of Malodors, while there are those who are glad to be put on the Committee of Eulogiums. After you have prayed, in the words of my text, for all that are in authority, you will say, "Brethren, Gentlemen, Mr. Chairman, excuse me from serving on the Committee of Malodors, for last night, just before I prayed for those in eminent position, I read that chapter in Corinthians about charity which 'hoped all things' and 'thinketh no evil.'" The Committee of Malodors is an important committee, but I here now declare that those are incompetent for its work who have, not in spirit of conventionality, but in spirit of earnest importunity, prayed for those in high position. I cannot help it, but I do like a St. Bernard better than a bloodhound, and I would rather be a humming-bird among honeysuckles than a crow swooping upon field carcasses."

Another reason why we should pray for those in eminent place is because they have such multiplied perplexities. This city at this time holds hundreds of men who are expectant of preferment, and United States mail-bags, as never before, are full of applications. Let me say I have no sympathy with either the uttered or printed sneer at what are called "office-seekers." If I had not already received appointment as Minister Plenipotentiary from the High Court of Heaven—as every minister of the Gospel has—and I had at my back a family for whom I wished to achieve a livelihood, there is no employer whose service I would sooner seek than city, State or United States government. Those governments are the promptest in their payments, paying just as well in hard times as in good times, and during summer vacation as during winter work. Beside that, many of us have been paying taxes to City, and State, and Nation, for years, and while we are indebted for the protection of government, the government is indebted to us for the honest support we have rendered it. So I wish success to all earnest and competent men who appeal to City or State or Nation for a place to work. But how many men in high place in City, and State, and Nation, are at their wits' end to know what to do, when for some places there are ten applicants and for others a hundred! Perplexities arise from the fact that citizens sign petitions without reference to the qualifications of the applicant for the places applied for. You sign the application because the applicant is your friend. People sometimes want that for which they have no qualification, as we hear people sing "I want to be an angel," when they offer the poorest material possible for angelhood. Bores waiting to be sent to foreign palaces as ambassadors, and men without any business qualification wanting to be consuls to foreign ports, and illiterates, capable in one letter of wrecking all the laws of orthography and syntax, desiring to be put into positions where most of the work is done by correspondence. If divine help is needed in any place in the world it is in those places where patronage is distributed. In years gone by awful mistakes have been made. Only God, who made the world out of chaos, could, out of the crowded pigeon-holes of public men, develop symmetrical results. For this reason pray Almighty God for all those in authority.

Then there are the vaster perplexities of our relations with foreign governments. For directions in such affairs the God of Nations should be implored. The demand of the people is sometimes so heated, so unwise, that it must not be heeded. Hark to the boom of that gun which sends from the American steamer San Jacinto a shot across the bow of the British merchant steamer Trent, November 8, 1861. Two distinguished Southerners, with their secretaries and families, are on the way to England and France to officially enlist them for the Southern Confederacy. After much protest the Commissioners, who had embarked for England and France, surrendered, and were taken to Fort Warren, near Boston. The capture was a plain invasion of the laws of nations, and antagonistic to a principle for the establishment of which the United States Government had fought in other days. However, so great was the excitement that the Secretary of the United States Navy wrote an applauditory letter to Captain Wilkes, Commander of the San Jacinto, for his "prompt and decisive action," and the House of Representatives passed a resolution of thanks for "brave, adroit and patriotic conduct," and the millions of the North went wild with enthusiasm, and all the newspapers and churches joined in the huzza. England and France protested, the former demanding that unless the distinguished prisoners should be surrendered and apology made for insult to the British flag within ten days, Lord Lyons must return to London, taking all the archives of the British Legation. War with England and France seemed inevitable, and war with England and France at that time would have made a restored American nation impossible for a long while, if not forever. Then God came to the rescue and helped the President and his Secretary of State. Against the almost unanimous sentiment of the people of the North the distinguished Confederates were surrendered, the law of nations was kept inviolate, the Lion's paw was not lifted to strike the Eagle's beak, and perhaps the worst disaster of centuries was avoided.

There came another crisis within the last two years, when millions of people demanded that American war vessels sail into Turkish waters and stop the atrocities against the Armenians. The people at large have no idea of the pressure brought upon our Government to do this rash thing. Missionaries and other prominent Americans in and around Constantinople assembled at the office of the American Legation and demanded that our Minister Plenipotentiary cable to Washington for United States ships of war, and they suggested the words of the cablegram. Had our ships gone into those waters the guns of foreign nations, everlastingly jealous of us, would have been turned against our shipping, and our navy, within a few years become respectable in power, would have crawled backward in disgrace. The proposition to do what could not be done was mercifully withdrawn.

There will not be a year between now and the next twenty years when those who are in authority will not need the guidance of the God of Nations. God only can tell the right time for nations to do the right thing. To do the right thing at the wrong time is as bad as to do the wrong thing at any time. Cuba will one day be free, but it will be after she has shown herself capable of free government. To acknowledge Cuban independence now would be to acknowledge what does not exist. The time will come when the Hawaiian Islands will be a part of our Government, but it will be when they have expressed the desire for annexation. In national affairs there is a clock. The hands of that clock are not always seen by human eyes. But God sees them only the hour hand, but the minute hand and when the hands announce that right hour has come the clock will stop and we ought to be in listening attitude. You see there are always in place authority unbalanced men who war because they do not realize what war they are designing men, who want war for the same reason that wreckers like canoes, and foundering ships, because what may float ashore from the ruins. See that men who start wars never get hurt. They make the spoils and others make the self-sacrifice. Those who advocated measures that would have brought on war between our country and Spain or England, if they had been successful in bringing about wholesale murder, they themselves now have been above ground, as they will be, to celebrate the birth of the twentieth century. If God had not interfered we would have had three wars within the last two years,—war with England, war with Spain, and war with Turkey. To preserve the peaceful poise which such men are disturbing we need a divine balancing, for which good men on both sides the sea ought to be every day praying.

Again, prayer to God for those in authority is our only way of being of practical service to them. Our pen advice would be to them, for the part, an impertinence. They have facts as we cannot have them, and the subject in all its bearings, and we be of no help to them except through supplication that our text advises that way we may be infinite reinforcement. The mightiest thing you can do for him is to pray for him. If the old Bible is true, and if it is not true it has been the only imposition that ever blessed the world, turning barbarism into civilization and tyrannies into republics.—If the old Bible be true, God answers prayer. You may get a letter, and through forgetfulness or lack of time not answer it, but God never gets a genuine letter he does not make reply. Every good prayer is a child's letter to his Heavenly Father, and he will answer it; and you may get many letters from your friends before you respond, some day you will say, "There! I have received ten letters from my daughter, and I will answer them now and at once, and though not in the way that she hopes for, I will do it the best way, and though she asked more sheet of music, I will not give it to her for I do not like the music spoken of. I will send her a deed to a house a lot to be hers forever." So God does in all cases answer in the way those who sent the prayer hoped for, but he does what gives what is asked for or something better. So prayers went up from the North and the South at the time of our civil war, and they were all answered at Gettysburg. You cannot make me believe that God answered only the Northern prayers, for there were just as many prayers answered south of Mason-Dixon's Line as north of it, and God answered what was asked for, or something as much more valuable, as a house and lot worth more than a sheet of music, or a good and intelligent man better than the Gulf of Mexico and the St. Lawrence River, who does not believe that God did the best thing possible when he stood nation down in 1865 a glorious unity, to be rent until the waters of the Ohio, the Savannah, the Hudson and the Alabama, are licked up by the long tongues of a world on fire.

Another reason why we should obey the divine injunction of the text and pray for all that are in authority is, that so much of our own prosperity and happiness are involved in their doings. A selfish reason, you say. Yes, but a right selfishness like that which leads you to the care of your own health, and preserves your own life. Prosperous government means a prosperous people. Damaged government means a damaged people. Let us go up together or we all go down together. We are touched by all events in our national history, by the compact in the cabin of the Mayflower, by the small ship, the Half-Moon sailing up the Hudson, by the treaty of William Penn. by the hand that made the "liberty bell" sound its first stroke, by the plowman plowing the high seas. And by all the events of past American history, certainly by all the events of the present day. Every prayer you make for our country, if the prayer be of the right kind and worth anything, has a rebound and benediction for your own body, mind and soul.

Another reason for obedience to my country is that the prosperity of this country depends on it, and we want a hand in helping it coming; at any rate I do. It is a matter of honest satisfaction to a soldier, when some great battle has been fought, and some great victory won, to be able to say "Yes! I was there. I was in the ranks that stormed those heights. I was in the ranks that bayonet charge that put the enemy into flight!" Well, the day will come when all the financial, political and other foes of this Republic will be driven back and driven down by the priorities that are now on their way, which come with slow tread and in "blue dress" when we want them to take a "double-quick."

In the year 1672, Holland was assailed. Her people prayed mightily. The ships of her enemies waited for the slides on which to come in. In answer to the prayers offered the tide, as ever before, was detained twelve hours. And before that twelve hours had passed a hurricane swooped upon the enemies' ships and destroyed them, and Holland was saved. If God detained the high tide in answer to prayer, will he not do it in answer to prayer? Surely it has been low tide long enough. May the Lord hasten the high tide of National Prayer. American citizens! our best hope is on God. We have all seen families in prayer, and churches in prayer. Well, we want yet to see is this whole nation on its knees.

The most of them are dead: those who in 1850 moved in that procession that marched down the City Hall of Washington, down Louisiana Avenue to Seventh Street, and through Pennsylvania Avenue to the North gate of yonder Capitol, to lay the corner-stone of the extension of that Capitol. The President who that day presided and solemnly struck the stone three times in dedication, long ago quit earthly scenes, and the lips of the great orator of that hour are dust, and the Grand Master of that occasion long ago put down the square and the level and the plumb with which, for the last time, he pronounced a corner-stone well laid. But what most interests me now is that inside that corner-stone, in a glass-jar, hermetically sealed, is a document of national import, though in penmanship. It is the penmanship of Daniel Webster, which almost ruined the penmanship of this country for many years. Because many thought if they had Daniel Webster's poor penmanship, it might indicate they had Webster's genius. The document reads as follows:

If it shall hereafter be the will of God that this structure shall fall from its base, that its foundation be upturned, and this deposit be brought to the eyes of men, be it then known that on this day, the nation of the United States of America stands as it is; that their Constitution still exists unimpaired and with all its original usefulness and glory, growing every day stronger and stronger in the affection of the great body of the American people, and attracting more and more the admiration of the world; and all here assembled, whether belonging to public life or to private life, with hearts devoutly thankful to Almighty God for the preservation of the liberty and the happiness of the country, unite in sincere and fervent prayers that this deposit, and the walls and arches, the domes and towers, the columns and entablatures now to be erected over it may endure forever. God save the United States of America. Daniel Webster, Secretary of State of the United States."

That was beautiful and appropriate at the laying of the corner-stone of the extension of the Capitol, fifty-eight years after the corner-stone of the old Capitol had been laid. Yet the corner-stone of our Republic was first laid in 1776, and at the re-establishment of our national Government was laid again in 1865. But are we not ready for the laying of the corner-stone of a broader and higher national life? We have as a nation received so much from God. Do we not owe new consecration? Are we not ready to become a better Sabbath-keeping, peace-loving, virtue-honoring, God-worshipping nation? Are we not ready for such a corner-stone laying? Why not now let it take place? With long procession of prayers, moving from the north and the south, the east and the west, let the scene be made august beyond comparison. The God of Nations, who hath dealt with us as with no other people, will preside at the solemnization. By the square and the level and the plumb of the Everlasting Right let the corner-stone be adjusted. Let that corner-stone be the masonry together of the two granite tables on which the law was written when Sinai shook with the earthquake, and inside that corner-stone put the Sermon on the Mount and a scroll containing the names of all the men and women who have fought and prayed and toiled for the good of this nation, from the first martyr of the American Revolution down to the last woman who bound up a soldier's wounds in the field hospital. Then let the building rise until its capstone be laid amid the shouting of all nations, by that time as free as our own divinely founded, divinely constructed, and divinely protected Republic, the last throne of oppression having fallen flat into the dust, and the last shackle of tyranny been hung up in museum as a relic of barbaric ages.

The prayer that the great expounder wrote to be put in the corner-stone at the extension of the Capitol, I ejaculate as our own supplication: "God save the United States of America!" only adding the words with which Robert South was apt to close his sermons, whether delivered before the court at Christ Church Chapel, or in Westminster Abbey, at anniversary of restoration of Charles the II., or on the death of Oliver Cromwell amid the worst tempest that ever swept over England: "To God be rendered and ascribed, as is most due, all praise, might, majesty and dominion, both now and forever. Amen."

TO CHEER FLOOD SUFFERERS.

A Christian Herald Relief Boat to Go Down the Mississippi—The Western Inundation Without a Modern Parallel—Many States Suffering.

A MISSISSIPPI "CHUTE"—THE RIVER OVERFLOWS ITS FORMER BED.

THERE is no record in our history of any overflow of the great Western rivers of such vast extent and productive of so much disaster and suffering, as that which is now in progress in the Mississippi Valley. As already stated in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the Weather Bureau at Washington had issued timely warning of the flood many days in advance of the actual event, and this tocsin of danger has unquestionably been the means of inducing some part of the population in the threatened sections of Missouri, Arkansas, Mississippi and Tennessee to take timely precautions; but there are many thousands to whom the official warning bore no significance, or who, at all events, let it pass unheeded. They had been accustomed to the annual spring rise of the great rivers, and, like the ancients who gave a deaf ear to the warnings uttered by Noah, they confidently concluded that the rise this year would be no more formidable or destructive than in previous seasons. The result shows how terribly they were mistaken. In the States mentioned, entire counties are now under water, and farms, orchards and growing crops have been obliterated by the deluge. Rain has fallen incessantly, and all the Mississippi's tributaries are swollen, while is up to the eaves of the houses. Some islands, never before known to be inundated, are now submerged. At many places above Vicksburg, the boats are floating even with the roofs of the houses. Tree-tops seem like a growth of willows through the waters. At some points high mounds of earth have been hurriedly thrown up, and to these all valuables and live stock have been taken for safety. Hundreds of refugees, now homeless and ruined, have been rescued by the steamers, and there are many thousands of others who have contrived to escape with their lives, but have lost all they possessed. Fine plantations along the river, as well as the quarters of the rich and the poor in towns and villages, are involved alike in the general disaster. At several points, the refugees are sheltered in school-houses and barns, and are being cared for temporarily by the local authorities. It is estimated that there are many thousands of families whose entire wants will have to be supplied for many weeks to come, and who will have to be helped even after the flood abates.

At the village of Flower Lake, Tenn., there is a break in the levee of 1000 feet, through which the waters are pouring with terrific force. Hundreds of cabins have been swept away, and thousands of head of cattle drowned. At Arcoia, Miss., which stands on high ground, the population of 500 has been swelled to 3000 by the flood refugees and as there is a great scarcity of provisions, much suffering is taking place. All the State of Arkansas south of Helena is a vast sea of water and the flood is unprecedented in the South generally. There are many small towns whose only way of communication is by skiffs. Appeals are being made to Congress from various quarters, urging speedy help.

In view of the distressing situation, President McKinley has decided to ask Congress to take the necessary steps for the speedy relief of the flood-sufferers. Meanwhile, as the need is extremely urgent, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has decided to make an immediate effort to reach and relieve the destitute in some of the flooded localities south of St. Louis. With this view it is now arranging for sending a relief steamboat down the river below St. Louis, carrying liberal supplies of plain, wholesome food, to be distributed where most needed. Telegrams received at this office from Hon. C. P. Walbridge, Mayor of St. Louis, and Hon. W. L. Clapp, Mayor of Memphis, assure us that such a plan is both practicable and desirable and that help is greatly needed at many points.

The telegrams are as follows:

MEMPHIS, TENN., April 5, 1897. Entirely practicable, relief steamers with food for man and beast doing great good. Have plenty skiffs to rescue from submerged territory where steamer cannot go. Help most needed below Memphis to Greenville.

W. L. CLAPP, Mayor.

ST. LOUIS, April 5. It is practicable and desirable to send a relief steamer down the Mississippi from this point. The places where help is most needed can readily be ascertained en-route.

C. P. WALBRIDGE, Mayor.

It is hoped by sending out a relief boat that considerable distress may be temporarily alleviated, and many of the unfortunate helped to bear their trials, until the national Government is ready to extend aid on a wider scale to all who are really in need.

Our Sunday School Contest.

Owing to the great pressure on our columns this week, we have been compelled to defer the publication of the new entries, etc., in the Sunday School Contest until next week, when the complete list will appear.

On either side of the river, along the Arkansas and Mississippi shores, the scene presented is an appalling one. Whole towns lie under water, which is from two to six feet deep in the streets, and the view beyond is that of a vast lake as far as the eye can reach. At some places, the water

CORN FOR STARVING INDIA.

Congress gives the Ships to Carry it and all are Asked to Help Fill Them —A Glorious Opportunity for Christian Service.

It is with sincere thankfulness that we announce that Congress has granted the petition of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and the Missionary Boards, and has placed another vessel at the disposal of the India Famine Relief Fund to carry corn to the starving people. News just received from India not only fully confirms and emphasizes the statements made in this journal as to the situation, but proves the wisdom of the course we have pursued in the distribution of relief. The secular journals of India which are not, as a rule, favorably disposed toward missionary work, refer to the valuable services being rendered by the missionaries in this crisis and to the help they are able to afford in the relief of distress beyond the survey of the government officials. The Pioneer Mail of Allahabad, says: "The missionaries in many districts have done splendid work in alleviating distress." The Times of India, published in Bombay, is disposed to be critical, but its criticism is based on an estimate of Christian spirit and duty which is plainly a tribute from the enemy. It asks: "What are the missionaries doing? It is clearly the duty of religious orders to seek out cases of distress and want in localities far removed from the scenes of Government operations." The very phrase, "religious orders," shows the attitude of the writer and the extent of his knowledge of missionary work. If he knew how meagre are the incomes of the missionaries, he would be aware how futile it would be for them "to seek out cases of distress," when they have no funds with which to relieve them. It is very gratifying to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to know that through the generosity of its readers, it has removed to some extent the reproach from these devoted servants of our Lord, who are only too glad to relieve the suffering around them, when they have the means of doing it. Even the Europeans in India, and much more the natives, evidently expect such service from the missionaries, knowing—what in happier times they are not ready to acknowledge—that Christianity is a religion of love and helpfulness.
The fact of this service being expected of them, renders it incumbent on us to see to it that for the honor of Christ and our holy faith, the missionary among hostile critics has in his hands the funds he requires for the Christ-like work. If the missionary is blamed for allowing men and women and children to starve to death at his door, it will be on us that the blame will fall, if we withhold from him the means of giving relief. Thanks to the noble liberality of our readers, fifty remittances of five hundred dollars each have been put in the hands of these willing almoners, and it will be known through the length and breadth of India, for generations to come, that in this hour of India's bitter need, American missionaries at any rate, were enabled by loving Christian hearts in their own land, to fulfil their Master's injunction to feed the hungry in his name.
To every one who has helped in this noble work, we are authorized by Christ's own words, to say: "They cannot recompense you, but ye shall be recompensed at the resurrection of the just."

Unhappily there are no indications in the latest advices by cable and the mail, or an indication of the need. It is truly heart-rending to read the incidents witnessed by travelers in the famine belt. A Catholic traveler sent out by the Times of India visited Bangalore. Then the pressure of the famine is so very real and the need is increased by the influx of people from the adjacent districts who have a native ruler, who cares nothing for the sufferings of his people. The Commissioners describe the poorhouse, and full-grown men there who could not have weighed more than four or five stone. Outside I found a man who had just died. On asking his neighbors I was told: Oh, he had come up to the poor-house that morning, but was too late for any food, as he had come after the morning distribution, and he had died. Two yards off him lay a man who was dying of dysentery, and there were several other cases round nearly as bad.

Another writer who visited Cawnpore and inspected the relief work, says:

I met poor, emaciated, dying creatures crawling along public thoroughfares, in the last stages of famine. One young man, who not long since must have been a stalwart husbandman, was a decrepit wreck, yet he struggled along a main street of Cawnpore, carrying on his back his aged and sightless mother who yet could not have been a great burden of weight for she was too lean and wasted. Was the street the place for such a pair? There was no one to step forward and convey them to a place of refuge where charity and money would keep them. Not far away from this scene were three or four wasted and almost ragged little waifs indicating by feeble gestures that they needed food.
Bowed down ghastly forms of men and women and children are to be met huddled in groups or alone, by the wayside waiting for deliverance from their hard lot, along the station drives, in the streets and on the high roads, all over the North West Provinces and Oudh. I heard an agonized sobbing on the roadside. This emanated from a pitiful object who could not wander further in search of food and shelter, as he had a large abscess on his ankle. I gave the man some coppers and, though he looked his gratitude, he shook his head as much as to signify that food was not his only want. I found a policeman, and pointed out the necessity of removing the poor creature to hospital. The policeman made a pretence of at once attending to the case; but an hour after I heard the man still crying out in the same spot, the ditch by the roadside.

In an article in the current number of the North American Review, by the Marquis of Dufferin, who knows India thoroughly, he describes in touching language the extent and urgency of the need and adds: "I cannot conclude without appealing to those who may read these lines on behalf of the suffering multitudes, who at are bright for her departure almost as early as originally contemplated.

Congress has appropriated not to exceed $50,000, to supply transportation for America's gifts of corn to suffering India. At the present freight-rate of $8.25 per ton to India, this means facilities for transporting over six thousand tons additional, which, with the four thousand tons at San Francisco, will bring America's full contribution to the cause up to the enormous total of ten thousand tons of corn. Besides this, the English government has intimated that further shipping facilities may be expected at their hands, and therefore corn contributors need have no apprehension as to the ability of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to make good its promise to see that every bushel of corn contributed within the United States reaches its destination in time to relieve great suffering and want.

Private advices which have come to hand, are to the effect that the famine may last even longer than was originally feared. The dependants on Government help at latest writing were as follows:

In Madras, 59,726; Bombay, 412,081;
Bengal, 411,530; Northwest Provinces,
1,621,442; Punjab, 118,617; Central Provinces, 324,576; Burmah, 27,363; Central Indian Agency, 133,890; Rajputana, 19,553;
or only 3,778,000 out of a total of 20,000,000, who are threatened with the horrors of death by starvation. Nearly 17,000,000 are totally unhelped, and unless the Christian world comes to their rescue, they will perish miserably. That the need of help is exceedingly urgent is made still more evident by a cablegram received by Dr.
Klopsch from Sir Francis Maclean, Chief Justice of India and Chairman of the Government Relief Committee at Calcutta which says:

"Cargoes of corn will be very acceptable in this awful emergency." The message extends the warmest thanks of the Indian reavement from thousands of peasants in India, and to win gratitude blessing. We ask all to unite with this humane warfare against hunger suffering; to aid in saving the coun-thousands who are dying for lack of while we have abundance. The time action is now—not later. Already glad news has been flashed across the

Dr. Talmage, the editor of journal, is intensely interested the progress of this great relwork, which he regards as a supreme Christian effort of century. In his church in Waington he made an eloquent peal in India's behalf on Sun-morning last, on which occasion the edifice was filled to over-ing and thousands were turned away unto gain admittance. Too much pracannot be awarded to Miss Mary Lett the well-known American missionary India and Ceylon, who devoted much tito the loving task of explaining the gre-need of India to our Senators and Rep-sentatives and to whose indefatigable forts is due much of the success atting the movement thus far.

We will send to pastors of church-superintendents or teachers of Sun-Schools, secretaries of societies, heads families, and to all who will undertake use them in this beneficent work, "Fam-Fund Mite Boxes" like that shown in t illustration, but slightly larger. They a-printed in gold, and every box bears f instructions how it shall be used. The boxes can be utilized very effectively b young people, and they will be found most efficient aid in helping India. Send postal card to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD
if you wish to have a Mite Box.

To all this it is unnecessary to add any words of our own. Our readers are giving generously and nobly, but in the name of Christ and for his sake, this good work should be continued. Let us for his sake give up some luxury, and practice some self-denial, that some poor hungry creato THE CHRISTIAN HERALD fund will save the life of a man, a woman or a child.

Since our last issue, a telegram has been received, informing us that owing to storms and washouts, resulting in bad roads there has been unavoidable delay in sending the corn contributed in different sections of the country to the railroads for forwarding to San Francisco, and that in consequence, the loading of the steamer now lying there has also been somewhat delayed. Now, however, the prospects

At the present time it seems that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be instrumental in forwarding at least 10,000 tons representing about 400,000 bushels of corn, provided sufficient money can be raised to pay the freight charges from corn centres to seaboard. We are confident that all that is needed is to make mention of this fact to our readers in order to secure the money required, and let the grand work of humanity and helpfulness go on without poor, stricken India and, as far as lies within the range of human effort, divinely

THE LAD EASTER-TIDE

AROUND the whole civilized world, wherever Christianity rules, the joyous Easter Festival is observed. It is a season of gladness both in a material and spiritual sense; for it ushers in the rebirth of nature, the upspringing of the flowers and the grasses, the budding of the fruits, while it also commemorates the resurrection of our Saviour and the spiritual rebirth of the human race.

It is variously observed in different lands, but everywhere the observance is a religious one. According to the ancient English Bede, the festival was originally a pagan celebration, dedicated to the Saxon goddess Eastre or Ostara, the goddess of spring, after whom the month corresponding to our April was called Eostur-monath. Among the Latins it was known as pascha, a word derived from the Chaldee or Aramaean form pesach, ("he passed over") in memory of the Hebrew Passover festival. The early Christians, however, derived from or connected with the Jewish Church, naturally continued to observe the Jewish festivals, though with a new spirit and significance and the Hebrew Passover became the Christian Easter, commemorating the true Paschal Lamb, Jesus, as the first-fruits from the dead. In the second century A. D., the observance had spread throughout the Christian world, although there was a difference as to the date of the festival which was afterward satisfactorily adjusted. It is now the chief festival of the Christian year as commemorating the central fact of the Christian religion.

Among the many customs peculiar to Easter is the gift of eggs. This is a custom of very ancient origin. Among the Greeks the "serpent's egg" was symbolic of the creation of the world which was deemed to have been produced from an egg; moreover, the "mundane egg" is found in the beliefs of the Phœnicians, Egyptians, Hindoos and Japanese. In some Christian lands, the rolling and cracking of Easter or "Pasch" eggs is a very event, typifying the re-creation of nature and the birth of spring. It was a Persian or Magian custom to present elaborately decorated eggs to friends, the custom again being to the "mundane egg" for which two spirits, Ormuzd, the good, and Ahriman the evil, were to contend till the consummation of all things. The same practice of gift-making was also known among the Jews, Egyptians and Hindoos. With Christian peoples, the egg symbolizes the resurrection, and the vivacious coloring of the shell is an allusion to the blood of redemption. In Russia special importance is attached to the ceremony of "breaking the eggs" at Easter. Gay dresses are worn, and friends and acquaintances salute each other on the street and exchange decorated eggs. Lilies and orchids are the flowers peculiarly appropriate to the festival. So great was the demand for lilies last year in the United States that it is said there was hardly a marketable bulb left in Bermuda. Lilies, roses, violets, hydrangeas, and tulips are also favorites at Easter, and florists strive to bring these to their highest perfection at that time. In our own land there is no gift more acceptable than a cluster of fragrant flowers. These are put up in a thousand artistic shapes, in baskets, pots, and vases. Decorated eggs, bonbons in dainty boxes, and many other loving souvenirs of like character are among the gifts exchanged between friends at the glad Easter-tide.

There are many legends, traditions and myths connected with Easter, most of them of very ancient origin. One of the priests of these among this is that on Easter morning the sun dances in the sky, whirling around and scattering a dashing shower of radiant beams over earth and sky, to express its joy at the rebirth of nature and the resurrection of the year.

Next to our Lord's resurrection itself as the central fact of the Christian Easter festival, the three resurrection miracles performed by the Saviour during his earthly ministry may appropriately be remembered at this time.

The photograph on the first page of this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is one that will interest every believer. It is an accurate representation of a very ancient, rock cavern-tomb at Bethany, and is affirmed on undisputed local authority, to be the identical scene of the greatest of our Saviour's miracles—the resurrection of Lazarus. Through all the changes of the centuries, it has been wonderfully preserved, having been faithfully guarded and repaired from time to time, and it still remains as a mute memorial of that day when the "Master of Life" stretched forth his hand, and the obedient grave gave up its prey.

Such was the fame of this great miracle that in later days the name of Bethany has been changed to that of el-Azariyeh, or simply Lazarieh. The village is now a comparative ruin—a mere hamlet, occupied by a score of families. Its inhabitants point out not only the traditional tomb shown only in the photograph, but also the house of Lazarus. Of the latter only a square tower now remains. The tomb is a deep vault in the rocks and the bottom is reached by twenty-six steps. This was the standard style of sepulchre among the Jews, and varied but little from the usage in patriarchal times.

Of all the miracles performed by the dumb with their great sorrow, sat apart, enveloped in heavy veils.

It was a strange gathering that assembled in the garden on that afternoon, before the tomb in which, four days ago, the beloved dead had been laid. St. John's narrative tells, with a beautiful simplicity of detail, all that occurred: the alternate doubts and fears of the relatives, the explanation by the practical Martha, which showed how little hope she had, after all, of any real help from the Master. But Divine Omnipotence had chosen the hour when all human hopes were utterly blasted, in which to assert itself! The stone was rolled away, and at the command of Jesus, "he that was dead came forth," yet bound in the cerements of the tomb. Who can picture the wonder, the joy, the ecstasy of that moment when the brother, but lately lost, was restored to the sisters? Their faith in Jesus, strong before, was now rendered impregnable, and gratitude overflowed their hearts. Never in the history of the world had so stupendous a miracle been wrought, and it necessarily made multitudes of converts to the faith. Lazarus lived thirty years after being restored from the grave, and tradition states that after the death of Jesus, he went to Provence with his sisters, and preached the Gospel in Marseilles, finally dying in Cyprus at a ripe old age.

By REV. LOUIS A. BANKS, D.D.

The Mother of "Ben Hur."

ONE of the most quietly and heroic personalities among living women to-day, is Mrs. Zerelda G. Wallace of Indiana, the widow of Ex-Governor David Wallace of that State, and the noble woman whose fidelity as a step-mother, giving more than a mother's usual devotion and tenderness, reared Lew Wallace to be a distinguished General in the War of the Rebellion, afterwards Minister to Turkey and, greater than all, to in it men and women of grand ideas and heroic purpose. Her husband was a man of fine literary culture, and together they enjoyed every new book, every speech, or sermon, and every newspaper that came in their way. In this way their evenings at home were almost ideal in their domestic beauty. When the babies were put to bed, and she sat with her feet on the rocker of the cradle, Governor Wallace would read to her the latest political speech, or newest book, which they would discuss with the zest of professional critics. Everything Governor Wallace wrote, speech, essay, or argument, was submitted to her for criticism or approval. Though she knew nothing of equity, as taught in the books, he complimented her by saying that her unerring sense of justice at once lighted upon any defect or discrepancy in jurisprudence, while her fine literary taste was invaluable in regard to rhetorical symmetry. As her step-sons grew older, she read law with them. In that way she not only kept in splendid fellowship with their young hearts, but became one of the best educated women in the science of jurisprudence in the country.

Such a home picture realizes Tennyson's poetic vision:

Two heads in council; two besides the hearth;
Two in the tangled business of the world;
Two in the liberal offices of life;
Two plummet dropped for one to sound the abyss.
Of science and the secrets of the mind.
In the long years liker must they grow,
The man be more of woman, she of man.
He gain in moral height, nor lose
The wrestling thews that throw the world.
She, mental breadth, nor fail in childward care,
Till at the last she set herself to him
Like perfect music unto noblest words;
Then comes the statelier Eden back to man,
Then reigns the world's great bridal chaste and calm.
Then springs the crowning race of human kind.

Mrs. Wallace is, as we would expect, a woman of the largest charity and forbearance. Frances Willard relates that when in 1874, the crusade clans gathered in Cleveland for the organization of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, Mrs. Wallace was nominated by somebody as Chairman of the Committee on Resolutions. Miss Willard, not yet knowing Mrs. Wallace, moved that the name of Mother Stewart, who had been so closely identified with the crusade, should be substituted in her place. Immediately after, Miss Willard went to Mrs. Wallace, to whom she had never spoken as yet, to explain her action. That great-hearted woman grasped her hand warmly, and said: "When you know me better, my friend, you will discover that in this sacred cause I have lost sight of all personal considerations." What a magnanimous and chivalrous heart was disclosed in that utterance!

One of the most splendid tributes ever given to any woman was paid to Mrs. Wallace by her step-son, General Lew Wallace, on the occasion of their first meeting, after his immortal book "Ben Hur" had been published. He asked her for her opinion on the book. She replied:

"O, my son, it is a non-such of a story; but how did you ever invent that magnificent character, the Mother?"
"Why, you dear simple heart," he answered, with a kiss: "How could you fail to know that the original of that picture is your own blessed self?"

THE VILLAGE OF BETHANY, WHERE LAZARUS WAS RAISED FROM THE DEAD.

Saviour, none have excited such universal wonder and controversy as "the three raisings from the dead." The raising of Lazarus was the last and greatest of the resurrection miracles. The tomb of Lazarus was like thousands of others in Palestine, a rocky chamber or recess which closed with a heavy stone that swung into a groove, excluding all air and light and affording ample protection against desecration by prowling animals. There the body was laid, having first been anointed with spices and made fragrant with myrtle, aloes and rose-water, then robed in the garments worn in life and finally swathed in linen wrappings. After the interment, the days of mourning continued. Hired mourners beat their breasts, their heads and their feet and wailed, wept and sang, while they extolled the virtues of the departed. The death-flutes sounded gloomily throughout the home. The sisters, have the qualities of mind and heart that could produce "Ben Hur."

This noble woman not only reared to honorable fame her three step-sons, but also six children of her own and grandchildren have kept her heart young in later years. She has exhibited in herself the kind of "New Woman" which is yet to bless the world. A woman who shall be large-minded and broad-hearted enough to keep a constant interest in public affairs, without in any way losing the gentleness and refinement of her womanhood.

It is said of Mrs. Wallace that when her husband became Governor of his State, Mrs. Wallace, by virtue of her social position and rare mental qualities, might have been what is known as a "leader" in social circles; but her soul was too great to be satisfied with the little round of social ceremonies and vanities. She cared for society only as she found

THE EASTER JOY.

SOMETIMES it seems as if joy had forever vanished out of this shadowy world. I suppose that was the way it looked to the disciples and the loving women, when that poor broken figure was taken down from the cross, and laid away in Joseph's tomb. "We trusted that it had been he who would redeem Israel." It had been he who could give the blind their sight, the deaf their hearing, the dead their life. Nevertheless, Jew and Roman had done their wicked will upon the Christ and though heaven and earth had alike protested, the one with its lightnings and its darkened sun, the other with its earthquakes and rent rocks, he had cried, "It is finished," and given up the ghost, and was gone!

So, with the blackness of despairing woe, those bereaved ones entered. They had loved and followed the Master, not believing or comprehending the truth in that word he had spoken that after three days he would rise again. The night that followed Calvary must have been unspeakably sorrowful to them in their desolate upper room.

The strangest thing, however, is not that those loving hearts doubted our Lord's resurrection, for, remember, that he had as yet appeared to them only as a man like themselves and their eyes were holden; but that we, Christians, with the New Testament in our hands, often behave as if we doubted it, too. If we believe with all our hearts that Jesus died and rose again, and that he is the resurrection and the life, then our lives should be serene, we should not be comfortless in sorrow, we should be hopeful even beside the grave. As our beloved Faber puts it:

If our hearts were but more simple,
We would take him at his word;
And our lives would be all sunshine
In the sweetness of our Lord.

Even the familiar fact of death, could not dim that exquisite sunshine.

I look back over the last twelve months, since I gathered a bunch of Easter lilies to lay on the grave of a dear one, and I think how often the silent angel has slipped over the door-sills of my friends. One summer day it was to carry home a noble young man, full of vitality, full of promise, beloved and cherished as few men are; the next it was to summon an old man, a man whose hand held many threads, and whose will was obeyed by a host of employees who looked up to and almost worshipped him; again a beautiful young matron went home, then a child in its sweet bloom, then a woman with white hair, but royally lovely in age and youth. The list is long of those who have vanished from my sight in this last year. Your experience has probably been similar. But, since God took the dear ones, and they went home, not to mere rest after a trite but to fuller life to larger service, to diviner gladness, why shall this Easter-tide be lamentable? Nay, for every one who crosses the river and enters the presence of the great King, there should be rejoicing for they have conquered in the fight, and henceforward they bear the palms of victory.

Friends who cannot sing the Easter songs, because a sore clutches at the voice and the tears choke the words, let me bid you to believe in the life everlasting! Believe that the disappearance from our short sight of those who have been in our earthly homes, does not mean that they are gone forever, only means that they have gone on. A few steps more, a bend in the road, a turn, and we, too, may join the majority, the vast numbers of those who have gained the safe haven, and are singing now with the choir invisible. We can let our beloved ones go across the globe, and can spare them for awhile. Why hold them back from heaven?

Easter sounds the highest note in our triumphant religion. Our Lord pledges us life, and, while every day shows us death, busy in our midst, every dawn, every Sabbath day, renews to us what Easter gives us in most lavish measure the assurance that There is no death, what seems so is transition.

Feeling this in our inmost hearts, though grief must have its way, there comes no grief which we cannot endure. The poor broken-hearted mother can do without her boy. She misses him all the time, but she can wait until Christ brings her to him, safe in the promised land. The companions of a life can be separated for a little while; death will restore each to the other. Friend can be content to give up friend, till the day comes when they are reunited.

One sweetly solemn thought,
Comes to me o'er and o'er,
That I am nearer home to-day
Than I have been before!

Nearer home! This is the core of the Easter joy! Home would not be home if it meant that we were to meet there only strangers, a lot of people whom we did not know, whom we had never seen. Easter would be a mockery if it did not hold the promise of home, with the dear ones gone before, of life among the living whom we know, of Christ's own blessed self to crown the feast, not one lost whom we ever loved and cared for, and whom the dear Christ gathered to the many mansions with his ransomed saints.

This is Easter at its highest! Then there is the other obvious joy of Easter, which comes to us with the spring, the return of flowers, the dance of the young leaves, the nesting of the birds, the rush of the rivulet. The woods are sweet with anemones; under the dry pine needles we shall soon find the trailing arbutus. The dog-wood will shine white through the forest windings; the laurel and honeysuckle, the violets and the daisies are coming, a great, sweet, brilliant, bewitching throng, marching in a blithe procession through the spring and the summer.

Sing a song of Easter,
A song of happy hours,
Of dashing spray and shadow play
And lovely springing flowers,
Of birds come home again to build
Beside the cottage eaves,
Of waking buds and rushing floods,
And dance of rustling leaves.

Sing a song of Easter,
A song that means a prayer
Of want and love to One above
Who keeps his world in care.
A song for all on this green earth,
For dear ones passed away,
Sing clear and strong the joyful song,
The song of Easter Day.

One duty is yours and mine, friend of the burdened, friend of the sorrow-stricken heart. We must, by all that is brave, unselfish, and Christlike, put our anxieties and griefs in the background, and go about the world with cheerful looks and words. Sorrow should not have dominion over the Christian. Because I am worried I need not worry my neighbors. Because I am lonely I may not, without incurring reproach, inflict my sense of loneliness on those within my home. The bravest woman, I ever knew, wrote to me once after a peculiarly distressing bereavement: "I do cry in the night, and my pillow is often wet, but I am cheerful by daylight." We must arise and gird ourselves and go on, and not cloud the home sunshine and hush the world's melody, because for us the sunlight has been blotted and the melody grown mute.

How fast the Easter crowd on one another. When we were children the years were longer. It used to be a far cry from Easter to Easter. But now the days go rushing past, faster than speed of a flying express. To fill each day with blessedness for those about us, to live as in the sight of God, to expect heaven and have its thought ever before us, to make life beautiful for the children and the old, this is to keep an Easter feast the whole year through.

Nothing is more common than the feeling and the expression in plain words of the feeling, that we cannot do much good in the world because we haven't many opportunities. We are poor, so how can we dispense charity? We are not gifted, how can we make a stir as those who have special talents? We are humble, therefore we can never amount to that which those can who have positions of eminence? The false reasoning is pitifully familiar. Now, once for all, we can, poor, rich, plain, eloquent, proud, or obscure, go about with smiling faces and uplifted heads and steady steps, and add to the joy of the world. Let us try to do this, from Easter onward.

Our Famine Heroes.

SUCH are the faithful missionaries, who are laboring so nobly in the interior of India, surrounded by plague and famine. They are striving with might and main in His Name, to stem the tide of distress, heedless of their own danger, if only the Master's work be well done.

Shall we not help them and hold up their hands in this conflict? It should be a joyful duty on the part of everyone professing Christianity to aid in this life-saving, soul-winning work in India. The most direct way to do this is to help the Famine Fund.

Now Fill the Corn Ships!

CONGRESS, appreciating the dreadful plight of India, has granted, by unanimous consent in both Houses, the petition of the Memorialists for the Relief Ships. The Secretary of the Navy is authorized to transport in American vessels, the gifts of corn to be sent by Christian America to suffering India.

This is a magnificent act. All honor to our American Congress for its broad, far-reaching humanity. Once more our land will be the first to send substantial succor across the seas, to those in direst need.

Now, let us fill the corn ships. Let every one, young or old, rich or poor, give one bushel of corn or its equivalent in coin. Give a sack if you can, or as much more as your heart prompts and your purse will allow. Don't be afraid of giving too much; you cannot begin to give half enough. Remember the millions in that tropical land who are sinking down to the grave for lack of food, multitudes already dead and others dying. Determine to save one life at least. A dollar's worth of corn will do it, and if you live to the utmost patriarchal age, you will never again be able to expend a dollar to such tremendous advantage.

Fill the corn-ships! Let the farmers of the West, the East and the Middle States make up their ear-loads of corn in sacks and send us word when a car is full. Let the churches and the Sunday Schools, the church societies and leagues, the townships and the little village communities, each make up their car load. This great privilege of life-saving and soul-winning service is laid upon the hearts of each of us, and it should be taken up gladly and performed with a joyous zeal.

Time is precious. Thousands are perishing. India is appealing. Heaven itself has opened the way for us to help. Let us fill the ships with corn!

BRIEF NOTES.

Dr. T. C. Paterson, of the Baptist Mission, Shantung, China, says that four hundred new women have been received into the fellowship of the Church during the year.

Rev. R. G. Pearson has been conducting revival meetings at Pensacola, Fla., with success. Thence he went to Pine Bluff, Ark., where union meetings have been held under his leadership.

Dr. A. C. Dixon held special services evening last week in the Adams Memorial Lutheran Church, East Thirtieth street, New York. Mr. J. H. Burke and an effective chorus had of the musical exercises.

A letter to a contemporary states that E. S. Canacho, for many years past Roman Catholic Bishop of Tamaulipas, Mexico, has received Christian principle, protested against the principles of the Roman Catholic Church, and has renounced Romanism.

Evangelist Arthur Crane writes us owing to a clerical error the recent evangelistic services under his charge were announced as being held at Cortland, N.Y., instead of Sister, Va. It was at the latter place that the Opera was used and overflow meetings in the church.

The Tenth Legion is the title of a new development in Christian Endeavor work. The legion consists of members who have pledged themselves to give at least one-tenth of their income to the Lord's work. The idea was a local one in New York, but has now been adopted by the Christian Endeavor Society.

Pundita Ramabai, with her colleague, drabai Powar and ten of the widows in her recently received baptism by immersion. It was administered by Rev. W. J. Hoskins, of the The Pundita's change of views on the sub-baptism is quite recent and is the more significant because of her previous associations.

Evangelist Leonard Weaver has just completed a successful series of revival meetings at Vin N. J. All the churches united in the movement and have received additions to their membership. A notable feature of the meetings was the earnestness of Christians and the general quaking of religious life within the churches.

The Church of the Disciples has entered vigorously into social settlement work. House is the new settlement. It was founded by students of Hiram College, and is the first of the kind among the Disciples. The House is located in the Sixteenth Ward of Cleveland, O., where congregated Russians, Jews, Bohemians, Italians, and negroes.

Preparations to celebrate appropriate the Fortieth Anniversary of the Fulton Street Mission are being made. It will be celebrated September next. It is proposed that a portrait of the founder of the mission, the venerable Mr. Laphier, should be painted and hung in the room. Several subscriptions toward a fund for the purpose have already been sent in.

The Evangelical Alliance is preparing a memorial to the Czar on behalf of the Christians in Russia. The Alliance has learned that great barbarities in some instances been shown towards those who have been sent into exile. The hopes that have been entertained some time ago that the young Emperor and his wife would speedily put an end to the state of things have not as yet been realized.

Mr. Moody has given a few days to a series of services in Chicago. Commencing March 10, he held services morning and afternoon in the Auditorium. The Cincinnati meetings were very successful. Music Hall was taxed to its utmost capacity to furnish sitting and standing room for the crowds which attended the meetings day by day, and thousands rose to express their desire for a better life, many of them taking this step for the first time.

Many testimonies have reached us of the blessed results of the four weeks campaign in the Brooklyn conducted by Evangelist Grant Caldwell. Although the meetings have closed in the churches of different denominations, the people are being sought by young people who were present at the meetings and have not been able to find peace without Christ. The work of the church in the district has received an impetus which promises to be permanent and far-reaching.

Dr. J. Hudson Taylor, founder of the China Inland Mission, summarizing the present situation in China, says: "The progress of the Gospel in China has been more remarkable than has been realized. Within the last seven years the number of Protestant communicants has doubled, and in spite of the hindrances caused by war, and massacre, not to speak of sickness, need, and deaths. The adherents connected with Protestant Churches probably number not less than 200,000; the communicants are over 70,000."

The Roentgen Rays have been turned to the benefit of religion and philanthropy. Dr. J. Caldwell, of Brooklyn, gave an exhibition of the rays a few days ago for the benefit of the fund for the erection of the missionary hospital at Ping Corea. The work there commenced by the late Dr. W. J. Hall is being carried on by Dr. Folwell. His dispensary so crowded that a hospital is urgently needed. It is proposed to make the hospital a memorial to Dr. Hall, who gave his life in service in Corea.

Northfield Training Schools, of which Dr. L. Moody is founder and president, closed its seventh year of work on April 1, with appropriate exercises. Among the speakers were Miss Ivanova, of Sofia, Bulgaria; Miss Schoell, of Brooklyn; Miss Bartlett, of Warehous, Conn.; and Miss Vette, of Boston, Mass. There was an exhibition of blackboard work, of sewing and of cooking by the students. Rev. M. Gray, D.D., of Boston, Mass., gave the final address to the young people.

The Press Committee of the International Christian Endeavor Convention announces that the meetings will be held in Mechanics Park and Woodward's Pavilion, the former being the largest building in San Francisco. The headquarters will find ample accommodation for the delegates, while leaving sufficient space for a room to accommodate 10,000 persons. A large number of churches will be used for early morning prayer-meetings and flow meetings. Arrangements are being made with the railroad companies for excursions to points of interest on the return journey east.

BUDHIST CAVE-TEMPLES.

SATTERED through India, Burma and Ceylon are the extraordinary places of worship, one of the most famous of which is pictured on this page. Some of them are devoted to the Brahmanical and Jaina faiths, but the most ancient are the Buddhist. It is said that the Buddhist king, Asoka, flourished about three hundred years before Christ, was the first to excavate a temple and to adorn it with statues of the great Gautama. They are found in Western India, where the strata of hills, alternately soft and hard, lent themselves easily to the work of the excavator. In some instances there appears to have been a natural cave which was hewn and adorned, but in others the cave was apparently wholly artificial. There are of five kinds: the Vihara or monastery caves, containing cells for the monks as well as the large hall supported by pillars; the Chaitya caves, which are almost uniform in plan, having a nave and galleries; the stupa caves, of which the Ajanta is one of the most famous specimens, and which differ from the other two kinds in their walls being sculptured instead of painted; a fourth kind are the rock-cut models of Brahmanical temples, the best-known being the Kailas of Ellora; the fifth are the Jaina caves, which are the most modern as well as the most insignificant. The cave of which a picture is given, belongs to the Chaitya group, which are all of Buddhist origin. It has on the outer wall a gigantic recumbent figure of the Gautama, forty-five feet in length. Nearly all the Buddhist caves are circular at their extreme end, and are divided by groups of graceful columns cut out of the solid rock. In the most ancient caves they are plain, unadorned shafts, but in the newer ones they have bases and capitals elaborately carved. The cells for the monks are cut in the walls around the main chamber. An American traveler who visited the caves recently says that the coloring is of the Pompeian kind, and is as fresh after all the centuries which have passed as if laid only yesterday. The statues in bas-reliefs, on the other hand, have suffered much in the lapse of time, and in some instances been so worn as to be barely recognizable. As we read of these wonderful temples with their carvings and paintings and sacred relics, we may look forward to the time when Buddhism, superseded by Christianity, shall cease to delude the people of the East, and the prophecy of God's ancient word be fulfilled:

"I shall go into the caves of the rocks and into the holes of the earth . . . and in that day a man shall cast away his idols of silver and his idols of gold which they made for him to worship, to the moles and to the bats." (Isa. 2: 19, 20.)

Accendary's Confession.

A strange explanation is given by a man now in prison in Brooklyn, N. Y., on the charge of setting fire to a tenement-house. It is a peculiarly fiendish crime inasmuch as the lives of many persons were endangered by the fire which was clearly of incendiary origin. It was at first supposed that the fire must have been set by some one who wanted to revenge himself on some enemy living in the house and was reckless about putting in peril other inmates who had done him no wrong. When the prisoner was arrested, however, it was found that there was no one in the house who even knew him. The evidence was so guilt being conclusive, the prisoner confessed that he would gain nothing by standing trial. He therefore made a confession.

He admits that he not only set the fire which destroyed this particular house, but he had set other fires in various parts of the city during the past three years. He says that at times he is beset by an irresistible desire to destroy property, and when it comes upon him he is like a maniac. He acknowledges that he had no enmity against the inmates of any of the houses that he set on fire; but claims that he is irresponsible owing to weakness of mind. He says: "When this feeling of a week, unbalanced, and uncontrollable mind presents itself, I am totally helpless. I believe that the excessive smoking of cigarettes was the starting point in my mental downfall. I use three or four packages of cigarettes each day. I want to be placed where the temptation to injure my mind with tobacco will be taken away. My thoughts as to what ought to be done are clear, but I cannot carry them out." Many people who would not be guilty of setting a house on fire might make the admission the pyromaniac makes in his last sentence. It is a com-widow. Ultimately the fraud was discovered and she was arrested. She protested that she did not know that she was doing wrong and that she supposed her friend had the right to leave her the papers if she chose. In consideration of her feebleness, the judge gave her the light sentence of two and a-half years in the penitentiary. She will realize now that there are some kinds of property that are not transferable. The pensioner's relations with the Government, in this, resemble every human being's relations with God: he has to account for himself and cannot transfer to another his sins or his merits. It may be hoped, however, that she may learn during her imprisonment that in the infinite mercy of God one way of transfer has been provided, by which she can make her peace with him. Though she has no merits of her own and can receive none from any other human being, Christ's merits avail and she can be accepted in him:

None of them can by any means redeem his brother nor give to God a ransom for him. (Ps. 49: 7.)

A Fatal Cyclone.

Distressing news of the destruction of the town of Chandler, O. T., is in the Western journals. It appears that about six o'clock in the evening of March 30, a bank of dark clouds gathered suddenly in the southwest and was whirled rapidly to the north. In its progress it assumed the dreaded funnel shape and uttered a mighty roar as it traversed the country, tearing that a large proportion of the injured will die. Some of the people were so overwhelmed by the calamity which had deprived them thus suddenly of home and friends that they lost their reason. Man probably never feels his utter helplessness so completely as he does in the presence of a calamity like this, against which there seems to be no defense. As we read the appalling details, we can form some conception of the figure employed by the prophet to describe the safety which is found in Christ against all the calamities of life:

A man shall be as a hiving place from the wind and a covert from the tempest. (Isa. 32: 2.)

The Cost of Mob Violence.

In compliance with a resolution of the United States Senate, the President has sent to Congress a list of all payments made to foreign governments for compensation for injuries inflicted on their citizens in this country, during the last ten years. From this list it appears that the total sum thus paid is $464,497. The largest part has gone to the Chinese. For two riots in which Chinamen lost life and property—one of them the famous Rock Springs, Wyoming outbreak—the Washington Government paid $147,748 and $276,619 to China as indemnity. The Italian Government collected $24,330 for the slaughter of the prisoners by the New Orleans mob in 1891; and for the killing of three Italians in Colorado, $10,000. The remainder of the sum was divided between Germany and Great Britain, both of whom had claims on our Government for injuries inflicted on their citizens here. The various sums have all been paid by the Federal Government, which hitherto has not been reimbursed by the States in which the lawless acts occurred. As we should insist on a foreign government making reparation if our own citizens suffered abroad, we do right to recognize and discharge these claims. Howsoever humble a man may be, he is entitled to have the championship of the government to which he pays allegiance. It is often forgotten that the Christian is thus protected. A distinct warning is given that the child of God, weak and powerless as he may appear, cannot be wronged with impunity:

Their Redeemer is mighty: he shall plead their cause with thee. (Prov. 23: 11.)

Lost in the City.

An incident reported by a journal of Toledo, O., shows how much a man's success in any line of work depends on his training. It says: On the last trip of the City of Mackinac with a cargo of horses for a local lumber firm came a backwoodsman. He had a great reputation as a "land-looker." Without a compass, by the bark and moss on the trees, he had been known to traverse a quarter section without diverging twenty feet from the straight line from stake to stake. He had heard much of the city, and thought he should like to see some of the wonderful things that he had been told about. He found work at once, his duties being to deliver lumber to the retail trade about the city. The first day a man was sent with him to show him the way about the town. The next day he was sent out alone, and did not return, and in the evening was found on the outskirts of the town with his load of lumber, so completely lost and unhappy that he had decided to stay there all night. Three times he was sent to deliver lumber, and three times he was found in another part of the city. Finally he asked his employer for transportation home. He declared that he found it absolutely impossible to find his way in a place where there were no signs to guide him. Yet the same man could find his way in places where the city carters would be hopelessly lost. To each the way is difficult when the signs are unfamiliar. It is so in the ways of life when, as so often happens, we find ourselves in strange and perplexing circumstances. Happy then is the man who follows the wise king's advice:

In all thy ways acknowledge him and he shall direct thy paths. (Prov. 3: 6.)

mon experience; even the great Apostle acknowledges that until he had the help of Christ he could not carry out his good intentions:

To will is present with me; but how to perform that which is good I find not. (Rom. 7: 15.)

Drew Two Pensions.

An astonishing fraud has been practised on the Government for twenty-nine years by an apparently simple-minded person. She is the widow of a naval officer who was drowned in one of the early naval engagements of the war. She was awarded a pension in 1862, which she has drawn regularly since that time. She also made a small income as the janitress of a large apartment house in New York. Among the tenants was a widow of a cavalryman, who was killed in battle. This widow, who also was in receipt of a pension, died in 1868. During her last illness, the janitress was kind to her and waited on her most attentively. The sick woman wished she had some way of rewarding her friend for her attention and at the last, she gave her the only valuable thing she possessed—the paper entitling her to the pension. Whether the janitress realized the nature of the fraud she was committing is doubtful, as she is somewhat obtuse; but she drew her dead friend's pension. Ever since 1868, when the cavalryman's widow died, to the present time, the janitress has had twelve dollars a month pension, in addition to the pension she received as a sailor's up everything in its way. The town of Chandler is partly on a hill-side and lay directly in the path the aerial monster was taking. Of the fifteen hundred inhabitants only a few witnessed its approach, and these had barely time to run to shelter. The cyclone struck the business part of the town first, tearing off roofs and twisting the great buildings into grotesque shapes. It went on to the residence quarter, dragging trees up by the roots and levelling houses with the ground. Thence it passed on to the open prairie, where its force was spent harmlessly. The scene in the town when the cyclone had passed was appalling. From the heaps of ruins where houses had stood only an hour before, tongues of flame were leaping, and the cries of the inmates pinioned under fallen beams were heartrending. So many of the people had been injured by the storm that it was impossible to organize any systematic attempt at rescue. Happily a drenching rainstorm fell and extinguished many of the fires. Messages were dispatched to Guthrie for help and a train loaded of physicians, firemen, and laborers was sent to the wrecked town. It was a night of terror to all there. Gropping in the fitful light of lanterns the dead and injured were taken out of the ruins and carried into the Presbyterian Church, which had been left standing and was turned into a hospital. Only fourteen dead bodies were found, but it is feared that many others must have perished and

PETER DELIVERED.

Sunday School Lesson for April 25.
Acts 12: 5-17. Golden Text, Ps.
34: 7. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

FELLOWSHIP with Christ's sufferings was regarded by the apostles as a privilege eagerly desired; it would have been a language which they understood not. (Ps. 31: 5). Had anyone attempted to console with them. Paul suffered the loss of all things that he might know Christ, and... "the fellowship of his sufferings." (Phil. 3: 10). Peter exhorted, "Rejoice inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings, that, when his glory shall be revealed, ye also may be glad with exceeding joy (1. Pet. 4: 13), and James tells us to count it all joy when we fall into divers temptations or trials. (Jas. 1: 2). "If we suffer with him, we shall reign with him;" if we pity ourselves, and avoid the suffering, what then? We are heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ if so be that we suffer with him; what if we do not suffer with him? What then of this joint kinship? How prove ourselves to be of royal blood?

Peter had been wonderfully used of God; once before he and John had been miraculously released from prison, and now, wherever he went, mighty words and deeds were spoken and done through him. But wherever God has a faithful witness there the enemy has an instrument ready to oppose him. Moses has his Pharaoh; Elijah has his Ahab; John the Baptist has Herod. Now Herod Agrippa, the successor of the Herod who murdered John the Baptist, was on the throne of Judea. He had inherited his predecessor's enmity against God, and he "put forth his hand to vex certain of the Church." James the brother of John fell a victim. This he found pleased the Jews, and that the policy of persecuting the Christians answered in bringing him into favor with the most influential of the people, over whom he reigned, therefore "he proceeded to take Peter also." He had heard, no doubt, of Peter's former most mysterious deliverance from prison, and took the greatest precautions to insure his safe keeping. He delivered him to the care of sixteen men, all of whom were responsible for their prisoner on pain of death. Chained to two of these men, there was little chance it would seem of escape. But, unseen by his keepers, there was another who was keeping guard. "The angel of the Lord encircled them about that fear him, and delivereth them." (Ps. 33: 7). And a power mightier than the chains which bound him, or the armed men who guarded him, was being exercised on his behalf.

Peter was kept in prison and his guards were empowered by the government of Judea. "But prayer was made without ceasing of the Church unto God for him." Prayer, what can that do? Says the scoffing world of our day, Prayer is nearer the throne of God than are the multitudes of angels which surround it. In the vials of the "living creatures" and the "elders," in the midst of and round about the throne of God are "the prayers of saints" (Rev. 5: 8), and "the prayers of all saints" are offered up with much incense on the golden altar which is before the throne of God (Rev. 8: 3). Herod's power stood no chance against the prayers which found acceptance with him who removeth kings and setteth up kings. (Dan. 2: 21). A coroner went forth from the throne, and all Herod's precautions were found to be availing.

God let things come to an extreme. How can we then act that he may test his children's faith to the utmost, and manifest to others what it is to trust God and what it is to receive succor from the Most High. It was the eve of the day on which Herod had fixed to bring forth his notable prisoner to the people, probably intending to have a public execution of Christ's apostle. Peter, who was one with God in all his dealings with him, was characteristically sleeping. A man who really trusts God is not kept awake by fear and apprehensions of what may come upon him from man; a great calm has settled down upon him, he is in the hands of God. "Peter was sleeping between two soldiers," to both of whom he was chained; and two of the others kept the door; how could Peter escape? "The angel of the Lord came upon him, and a light shined in the prison," but none of the keepers saw it. When God sends sleep upon men no one and nothing can wake them till he wills. The angel smote Peter on the side, saying, "Arise up quickly," and at the same moment he was a free man; his chains had fallen to the earth. Did their clanking awake the keepers? No; either they fell noiselessly or God kept the keepers' ears. The angel commanded Peter to gird himself and bind on his sandals, so as to be ready for a journey; and then he said: "Follow me." And Peter obeyed, yet like one in a dream. On the former occasion when he was delivered from prison, the battle with "the powers that be," had only just begun, he and John had been only one night in prison, and they were fresh and full of the impetus of Pentecost. Now persecution had become more systematic. Peter had been some time in prison, and had in a way become accustomed to it. God never wants us to get into a groove, even in fellowship with Christ's sufferings, but to be as ready to accept deliverance as to suffer, to suffer as to accept deliverance.

The angel led on; keepers, bolts, bars, were as though they had no existence. No force was used; by the will of their Creator, everything yielded before the angel and the man whom he had sent out of that prison. Once the length of a street from the prison gate, the angel departed, and Peter was left alone. Now he awoke to full consciousness of the situation; God had sent his angel to deliver him, and he hastened to tell the glad news to the praying company which had gathered in the house of Mary the mother of Mark to pray for him. It was an unusual hour for a visitor; could mischief be in the wind? They sent a damsel, not to open the door, but "to hearken." The well known tones of Peter's voice, the very man they were praying for, so overjoyed her that instead of opening the gate, she ran back to the praying ones to tell them that Peter was there. "Thou art mad," was their answer. Probably they looked for the answer in quite another way. Let us be prepared for God's answer to our prayers as he wills, in his way, not in ours. When Rhoda constantly affirmed that it was certainly Peter, they decided that it was his spirit. At last they opened the door and their belief was rebuked, for Peter indeed stood there and told them the wonderful story of his deliverance. Is it wonderful, that God should answer prayer and deliver his own child? May we not often remain in some prison from which God would willingly release us if our eyes were fully upon him? Are not our prayers for others, like those of this company, often hindered, because we cannot receive an answer which comes in an unexpected way?

And Herod? He had found that God's permission must be obtained for the destruction of one of his own children. It was an easy thing for such a man to put the keepers to death; the lives of sixteen men were of no value to him in comparison with the maintenance of his sinful pride. But God had set before him a lesson of his power, and the wicked king, if he neglected it, did so at his peril. There was enough in the life and in the past history of Peter to make Herod aware that God had delivered his servant. For Herod to ignore it was for him to wilfully despise God. He had got rid of James, and Peter was no longer to be found in Jerusalem, but the God of these his servants lived still; and the king's attitude challenged him to prove himself the Almighty.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

ALTHOUGH Peter had been delivered from prison by an angel once before, as related in the fifth chapter of Acts, his deliverance on this occasion was evidently unexpected both by him and by the Church. If Peter had forgotten it, the authorities had not. The detailing of sixteen soldiers to keep one prisoner, indicates that they apprehended the possibility of losing him. The guard probably was arranged according to the death. Herodias, who was really sible for that murder, was the sister Herod. They were the two children Aristobulus, one of the numerous of Herod the Great. The Herod lesson was named Agrippa, and father of that other Herod Agrippa whom Paul pleaded (Acts 25: 13). His first experiment in winning favor to seize James and put him to death. There was no divine interposition case of James. We are not told it was implored, but we know from our own experience to be that God does not permit us to covariably upon being saved from danger whenever we may call upon his reasons not disclosed. James of Peter is delivered, though ultimately too, had to seal his testimony with blood. This James was one of the of Zebedee, for whom their mother the honor of sitting next to Christ. He is a different James from the of the Epistle called by his name was a brother or cousin of our Lord who lived sixteen years longer. mentions him in the seventeenth. Having put James to death, and that the act increased his popularity Herod goes further. This is the course. There is a momentum which is always pushing the sin from one crime to another. That it is so important to watch against the beginning of sin. It is sure to more and worse sins. But case, Herod was not permitted to carry his plan into execution allowed the imprisonment to continue until the very eve of execution. Peter does not appear to have been much distressed by the prospect of death. He was sleeping so soundly he had to be smitten before awakened. Conducted into the streets, he did not at first know that his deliverance was at hand but like the praying man thought that it was a vision. It was singular that the praying man in Mark's house should have been so slow to believe. That is what whom, by the way, mentions with his characteristic precision, by name, recognized him and believed, but he doubted. It is worthy of note that this humble girl should have attained historical immortality. Doubtless the great ladies of Herod's court and of Jewish society scorned her, but after centuries their names have been forgotten, while every school child knows the name of the servant who answered the door on that memorable occasion. It is always the great ones of the world whose names will live in history. Though with feminine modesty Rhoda did not admit the Apostle, she rejoiced over his deliverance and was the only one who believed it real. The

THE TOWER OF ANTONIA, THE TRADITIONAL PRISON OF PETER.

Roman custom of watches, one quaternion (four soldiers) having charge for a watch of three hours, two soldiers manacled to the prisoner and two on guard outside the door. At the end of the watch, another quaternion would relieve the guard. It would be curious to find out the motive of placing this extra guard. If it was to prevent a rescue by Peter's friends, the number seems to have been unnecessarily large; but if it was to prevent a supernatural rescue, even Herod must have deemed it inadequate. The scene of imprisonment was probably the Tower of Antonia, a photograph of which appears on this page. The historian does not specify the charge on which Peter was imprisoned, but the story appears to indicate that it was one punishable with death. The motive is recorded. It was done to please the Jews. Herod craved popularity and was shrewd enough to perceive that there was no better way to gain it, than to take hostile measures against the leaders of the new sect. He had been only a year on the throne and his position was precarious. A change in the imperial favor might displace him at any time, and this might be brought about by evil reports of him sent to Rome by the Jews. He was anxious to stand well with them. This Herod was a grandson of the Herod who slew the children at the time of Christ's birth, and a nephew of the Herod who put John the Baptist to found it easier to believe in a ghost in the answer to their prayers. It still. We read of "remarkable" answers to prayer, and people tell of them; they were exceptional. Possibly we expected them with more confidence than should have more to rejoice over.

When he had considered the matter, "People do not always do that after they have been delivered. A Christian may be distressed by payments coming due for philanthropic work that he was not to meet. Before leaving home in the morning he prayed to God for help. He went out he glanced at the Scripture calendar on the wall of his office and that the text for the day was "Thy mighty shall be thy defence and thou shalt have plenty of silver." (Job 22: 5). Late in the day he was still seeking but had found none. As a last resort he called on a friend who was interested in his work and had helped him before. He described his position, and his friend volunteered to help him. "If you can with silver dollars," he said, "I can give you now; but I cannot get bills. The bank opens to-morrow morning. I took the money and went on his way with a mind relieved. As he paid, his friend remarked: "You seem to have plenty of silver." Then the text of the morning occurred to him, and he realized that the promise had been literally fulfilled.

THE FAMILY AND HOME CIRCLE.

A EASTER LILY FIELD.

the Many Beautiful Sight to be Witnessed in Picturesque Bermuda—Walking in a Sea of Lily Blossoms.

O the lover of flowers, there can be no grander or lovelier sight than a field of waving Easter lilies, such as that which is shown in our photograph. Although this splendid lily is found in various parts of the globe, nowhere does it attain a more regal magnificence than the Bermuda Islands. Our photo was taken in "Great Bermuda," which is just outside the town of Hamilton, the capital. There the lilies are in great stretches of meadow land. They are usually cut a few days before the flowers are in bud. The lilies are wrapped in moist tissue paper, and the precious blossoms are then packed and shipped. They remain fresh and unwithered for a considerable time. In the harbor of Hamilton, the shore is beautiful, especially during the season of flowers, when the fields of lilies are among the deep green of the cedars and the white of snow. The vegetation in the Bermudas is very different from the earth is clad in a mantle of perpetual green. Along the shores of the islands is a fringe of mangrove; the pear grows profusely, sage-brush everywhere, and the citron, lime, lemon and orange grow wild, while various sorts of trees abound. Esculent plants and flowers are exceedingly prolific, and within comparatively recent date, a considerable export trade has grown up in arrow-roots, potatoes and tomatoes, and such medicinal plants as castor, and jalap, while coffee, indigo and sugarcane grow spontaneously. Reptiles are numerous, but there is a grand variety of birds, bright in plumage if not in song. Fishes, great and small, are swarming in the creeks and ponds, tempting the hook of the angler, and the ditches glitter with pretty goldfish. There are some drawbacks, however, one of which is the scarcity of fresh water, and the liability of strangers to clime. One of the annoyances is the presence of myriads of ants, which are everywhere, committing great damage in the heated season.

Result of Handshaking.

A great deal is said and written about the issue of Presidential handshaking. The subject has lately been interestingly discussed by ex-President Harrison in his temporary's columns. He writes: "The first two weeks of an administration the President shakes hands with thirty to sixty thousand persons. The drain of this is very great, and if the President is not an instructed hand, it is a lame arm and a swollen hand. This may be largely, or entirely avoided, by using President Hayes' motto—take the hand extended to you before your hand is gripped. It is a passive hand that gets hurt. It is suggested that a nod or bow should be substituted for the handshake, which would be quite as admissible to the Declaration of Independence."

Useless and Crossness.

Disobedience comes easy to the child brought up in an atmosphere of fret, writes a thoughtful parent, while it is the sunny disposition of those who have lovely children that make the world not thus blest covet their possessions. Sweetness like crossness is a curse. A sunny wife is a joy forever, while the woman with a continual drip of discontent is a thorn in the flesh that will wear out the patience and love of the ordinary man no matter how much he may fuss and fume also. Women should show men a better way to take life's discipline. And as for the children who are so unfortunate to have both parents of this take-to-life-hard disposition, they are likely to have a poor time of it.

Love in the Home.

Love is the wind, the tide, the waves, the sunshine, wrote Thoreau. It never ceases, it never slacks; it can move with the globe without a resting-place; it can warm without fire; it can feed without meat; it can clothe without garments; it can shelter without roof; it can make a paradise within, which will dispense with a paradise without. But, though the wisest men in all ages have labored to publish this force, and every human heart is, sooner or later, more or less, made to feel it, yet how little is actually applied to social ends. True, it is the motive power of all successful social machinery; but, as fewer of these he uses up each day the more days they will last—that is, the longer he will live. I believe that a man might live one hundred years if he would sleep most of the time. That is why negroes often live to advanced old age, because they sleep so much. The proper way to economize life is to sleep every moment that is not necessary or desirable that you should be awake."

Grumblers and their Ways.

Take the people who are always grumbling, writes Rev. H. P. Snyder, and finding fault, and they throw away the precious pearls of life—the gems that are most beautiful and valuable. They trample the sweet-blooming flowers about them under foot, and shade the present with dark clouds of the past. They are never satisfied—all the time finding fault about something. The weather is not as it should be—either too wet or too dry. The wind is always in the wrong direction. The sun is too hot. The wheat crop is a failure. The next-door neighbor does not mow his lawn. The hired man does not do as he should. Jane is the most careless girl that ever lived. The children have done some little thing over which they make a terrible noise. The wife has not done as she should, and so there is a continuous clatter. Their horses are not as good as other people's. They work harder and do less than their neighbors. They have seen more trouble than all the people

EASTER LILIES IN FULL BLOOM NEAR HAMILTON, BERMUDA.

EASTER LILIES.

FOR Easter day, O lilies white,
Your shined splendors keep!
But while the sweet, sad waning light
Of Easter even fades,
Amid the sacred shades
Where sorrow comes to weep—
Nor weeps in vain,
Since hope is born of every pain,
(And pain its pangs in joy forgets),—
There breathe your balm, sweet violets!
Dear twilight flowers, whose lovely hue,
More tender than the tenderest blue,
Yet not as purple sad, appears
Most like transformed tears.

Sweet odors—sweeter than the sweet
Of violets and lilies blent,
The sweet of holy slumber spent,
Stealing from vesture folded fair,
And fragrant with the Lord's own care,
Wherein his blessed body lay
Till break of day—
Shall make most sweet the graves of those Who, entering into Paradise,
Do sleep in him who died and rose,—
In whom they too shall rise.

—HARRIET McEWEN KIMBALL.

in physics, we have made the elements do only a little drudgery for us, steam to take the place of a few horses, wind of a few oars, water of a few cranks and hand mills; as the mechanical forces have not yet been generously and largely applied to make the physical world answer to the ideal, so the power of love has been but meanly and sparingly applied as yet.

Sleep as a Life Prolonger.

It is a great mistake to rob oneself of sleep, under the impression that a few hours less of repose makes no difference to a healthy frame. Nicola Tesla, the celebrated scientist says: "A man has just so many hours to be awake, and the

from the days of Adam to the present time. The real trouble is with the grumbler. If there is a class of people to be pitied, it is this class! It seems to have become chronic with so many, and is so sure to prove fatal when a person is attacked by this terrible disease, that the situation is really becoming alarming.

BEAUTIFUL DAY.

BEAUTIFUL morn—with thy life so new
To heaven seems but a step or two!
And youth glides merrily down the way
Singing songs to the beautiful day,
While his simple prayer—a faith untold—
Swings wide the eternal gates of gold.
But, turning to pluck the way-side flowers,
His joy is chilled by the falling showers.

Beautiful noon—with thy tranquil ease,
And carol and croon of birds and bees!
And man looks back from the hill-top there
On many a grass-grown mound of care,
Then down he treads in the path of right,
Across the vale to the edge of night,
Where unseen forms in purple array
Gently are closing the gates of day.

Beautiful eve—with thy promise low,
Drowsily hummed by the river's flow!
And while age sleeps on the twilight side
A snow-white sail goes out with the tide;
And from every tower and dome sublime,
The cathedral bells of heaven chime;
Glad angels sing, and the harpers play—
Beautiful dawn of eternal day!

New Name Game for Children.

SOME time ago, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD described an interesting "name game" for the little folks, which doubtless afforded many of them entertainment during the evening hours. Below we give an outline of another game of names, which may be played by any number. Suppose that ten children decide to play. Each is provided with a long slip of paper and a pencil, and if one of the players has a watch so much the better; if not a clock must be used. One commences by calling out: "Girls' names commencing with A; two minutes allowed." Each player then writes down all the girls' names that he (or she) can recollect, and at the expiration of the two minutes "time" is called. Then the oldest player reads from his (or her) slip all the names he or she has written down—say, Amy, Amabel, Alice, Ann, Annie, Amanda, Aileen, etc. All the other players, as the names are read out, cancel any name read out. If, for instance, all have written Amy, all cancel Amy, and count one mark. Say six players have Amabel and four have not, each of the six count one mark; those who have not thought and written down Amabel get nothing for Amabel, and so on through the list. The object of the game is to teach the children all girls' and boys' names. When the marks have been allotted for all the names, the total of marks is read out and noted on each slip. The players then proceed in a similar manner for all boys' names commencing with A, such as Alfred, Abel, Adam, Andrew, Arthur, etc. The game can be continued till all the letters of the alphabet are exhausted. Anyone introducing pet names, such as Pussy, Kit, Teddy, etc., forfeits two marks, unless it be arranged that they be allowed.

Those California Roses.

In a recent issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a letter from a California reader was published which contained a most attractive description of "California Roses." Mr. I. Longman, of Whittier, Cal., the reader in question, writes us again, as follows:

I have received numerous letters of inquiry concerning this locality. Whittier is located at the foot of the Puente Hills, 15 miles south-east of Los Angeles, 18 miles from the sea-coast, and 500 feet above sea level. From it can be seen nineteen towns and cities, and the entire San Gabriel valley. There is not a month in the year in which there is not fruit to gather, and there are thousands of roses in bloom here every month the year round.

Mr. Gladstone's Dietary.

England's aged premier owes his vigorous health largely to the observance of certain simple rules, one of which relates to the mastication of his food. He always paid great attention to this requirement of nature; but in recent years he laid down a rule for his children that "thirty-two bites should be given to each mouthful of meat, and a somewhat lesser number to bread, fish, etc." While this rule might not suit each individual case, it calls attention to an important fact. A little attention will ensure the duty being conscientiously performed through life, with the most beneficial results. "Truly," says a writer, "history turns upon small causes!" Had ex-Premier Gladstone been less careful in his dietary, his influence upon European politics might have been totally different.

THE KING'S HIGHWAY

A STORY OF THE BROADER CHRIST-LIFE

Jessie's Ambition and Nicholas Lloyd's Failure.

BY

AMELIA L. BARR.

JESSIE'S conduct had a contrary effect on Steve. Above all things, Steve loved justice. No one could coax him beyond his conscience, and he was not to be worried into doing wrong for the sake of peace. Of course he suffered. Every one of his wife's tantrums was like a storm that stretched and strained his heart strings nearly asunder. He felt that some day the point of breaking might arrive, and he trembled in the fear, for he still loved the foolishly ambitious woman. This day he had come home very needful of comfort. The hot weather had given him an overpowering longing for the peace of mountain solitudes and the freedom of a life without dinner-time and dressing for it. If Jessie had met him with a kiss and a loving word, if she had pitied his longing a little, if she had sung to him some lulling melody as he sat by the open window, then he could have mastered the spirit craving within him, and bent his will to hers in everything necessary for their happiness.

But the first sight of her rebellious beauty, and of John's troubled face, roused in him a resistance she little understood. When John shut the door behind her crying, Steve shut his heart against the same irritating sound. He would not soothe it, he would not listen to it, he sat gloomy and silent until there was a cessation of the storm. Then he said: "I am hungry, Jessie."

"Dinner is ready, go and get it," she answered. "I don't want to eat. I am ill. I have no appetite."

He went, he ate his dinner alone, and Jessie, who did want to eat, was incensed by his obedience. She expected him to coax her to the dining-room. It was the first time he had ever taken her at her word. If she had been wise she would have pondered the meaning of that step. On his return to her presence, he said:

"Now Jessie, go and eat. I will not disturb you."

"I have told you I have no appetite. I want a change of air. I want to go to the sea side. The doctor says so."

"You never left New York in the summer before."

"I was never married before."

"That is true. Well, then, you must make inquiries about some place that we can afford. We are lots in debt, but I don't suppose your going away will make much difference."

"Indeed it will. I want to go to Newport. Alice is going, your mother is going, and I want to go also."

"I cannot afford Newport, Jessie."

"Then I shall go anyway. Your name will get me credit. Alice and Mrs. Lloyd will be compelled to notice me; indeed, they may as well entertain me as not."

"Jessie, neither I nor you have a right to intrude on my family. Mother has already paid a great deal for us."

"She ought to give you far more than she does."

"She gives me sufficient. I will ask her for no more."

"Then I shall."

"If you beg or borrow money in my name, I will never forgive you."

"We shall see."

At these words Steve rose, and taking his hat from a table, threw over in his reckless haste a trifle of glassware with a rose in it. The glass was shattered to pieces, the rose lay on the table, and the water ran down upon the pretty carpet. Jessie rose in a passion. "Oh, my lovely vase," she cried. "Oh, my lovely vase! It is broken to pieces! Look what you have done, sir!" But Steve did not turn his head, he pressed his hat down on his brows, and left the house with that unmistakable clash at the door, which is a declaration of domestic war. And Jessie picked up the bits of her broken vase and wet them with her angry tears, but she did not remember the shattered love in the great, affectionate heart of the man her evil temper had just driven from his home.

These events introduced a summer full of change to the Lloyd family. The first of importance was the recognized engagement of Miss Lloyd to Lord Medway, and immediately after it Mrs. Lloyd accompanied her daughter to Newport. Both circumstances took place without any participation on the part of Steve. He had already refused to meet the foreign nobleman who was to marry his sister, and receive so large a slice of the Lloyd estate, and Jessie's rebellious indignation, both at his refusal and at his family's acceptance of it, probably induced a certain amount of stubbornness in Steve's actions. Jessie blamed Alice entirely. She was sure that Alice had great influence over her brother, and she thought she understood that as Steve's presence must have included hers, Alice preferred to do without her brother's support rather than permit her to have any share in the bridal ceremonies. In reality there was some truth in this surmise, but it arose from a feeling that was as yet carefully hidden in Alice's own heart. For assure herself as she would a certain irrefragable presentiment of unfulfillment pressed upon her, and she did feel that any trouble coming would be more intolerable by Jessie's intermeddling in it.

For herself she knew not whether this presentiment gave her the most pain or pleasure. That she was not in love with Lord Medway she frankly acknowledged; indeed, she had made one last effort to free herself from the entanglement which had somehow grown with the day and night around her. But this final appeal to her father had been met with such disastrous consequences to his already shattered health as to lead the physician in attendance to remonstrate almost angrily with her. For he could not believe the girl was in earnest, and so he characterized her attempt to deliberate as a cruel bit of affectation.

"It is pretty enough, Miss Lloyd," he said, "to hesitate and to stand with reluctant feet on the brink of matrimony, and no doubt it is stimulating to the bridegroom, but I can assure you it is death to your father," and wounded and offended by the frank remark, what could Alice do but avoid a repetition of a rebuke so unjust, and yet so beyond her power to answer?

So as the weeks went by she rode and walked and danced with her betrothed, and tried to forget that John McAslin had ever loved her. "Every one has something to sacrifice," she thought, "and how could I hope to be happy if I pleased myself and killed my father? And after all what is a love match? Steve's was a love match if there ever was one, and yet he is not happy! I know it. I feel it in his words and manner. Perhaps then a marriage for duty may turn out as well as a marriage for love." And then she would rebel a little and protest, "I know not how I came into this snare."

Alas, she had not reflected in time that the slightest concession is the first ripple of circumstance, and that after it the tide rises, and the wave behind impels the wave before.

But even this slight revolt against destiny was one morning brought to truce, for while such thoughts were making her walk up and down the long parlor to their restless tenor, she saw a book that some visitor had been reading and left open, leaves downward. Her sense of order made her stop to shut the volume, and her eyes met the far-seeing eyes of the great Dryden, and these were the words he said to her:

Receive my counsel and securely move,
In trust thy fortune to the powers above;
Leave them to manage for thee, and to grant
What their unerring wisdom sees thee want.

Lines noble in themselves, and serving as a finger post to the still more beautiful and familiar ones—"Commit thy way unto the Lord, and he shall direct thy path."

When a certain destiny has been accepted it is natural and wise to make the best of whatever advantages it has. Alice was young and hopeful, and she was not insensible to the promises her lover made her.

For a few weeks she was happy, she put down resolutely all thoughts disloyal to her engagement; she suffered no regrets from the past to darken the horizon of a future, which she was honorably bound to make joyful for others as well as herself. In the meantime she had what ever of passing eclat and pleasure were incidental to her betrothal, and she liked it. That she should do so was natural and honest. It would have been the merest affectation to pretend a sentimental regret, or to affect a sacrificial resignation to a fate which at least was not distasteful to her.

Still there was at the bottom of all her expectations a doubt that chilled her hopes and prevented her from relinquishing her affections. About the beginning of August this doubt became a fear. Nicholas Lloyd's condition was no longer subject to long or short intermissions of lucidity and comparative health. He had become quite inattentive to business, and his egotism and extravagance—moral perversions in direct opposition to his natural character caused general remark. Physical changes just as striking were also in evidence, and his physician wrote in unmistakable terms to Mrs. Lloyd, "It is the beginning of the end with him," he said. "I think you should be here as soon as possible, and if Mr. Lloyd has not yet arranged his business affairs and made his will, you must tell him I say he has no time to lose."

This letter was of the gravest importance as regards Alice's affairs, and while Mrs. Lloyd hardly knew what to act. A delay in her marriage would be most unfortunate, and yet it was sible for her to urge its immediate summation. Nor could she keep her row in her own heart; it was necessary to take Alice at once into its sad in. She found her in her room sewing ing to her hopes. "Alice," she said, "sad news this morning, my dear father is seriously ill, and Dr. thinks I ought to return immediately to New York."

"Cannot father come here? I go to New York I must also go. I leave Newport in the height of son, mother, is so remarkable. Arthur think of it?"

"Your father cannot come here. It requires the constant medical care only get in New York; also there business to settle—and number things. I, at least, must go home."

For a few minutes Alice could not think of the thing that she feared had happened to her. Her heart turned faint thought of all the humiliations and pointments that were sure to come wanted to weep and she could not turn her mind this way and the see if perhaps some means could not be found for her. It was less, she could only imagine one an immediate informal marriage there was something to her appearance unspeakably selfish even in the wish for such an escape—she did name it. Yet she was not sorry her mother say:

"Arthur must now be told the truth. We can no longer attribute eccentricity of character what mortal disease. When he understands your father must necessarily grow worse, and that the only hope is in death, and when he considers death means at least a year's delay to family and social feeling, sure he will urge an immediate marriage. I should agree to it, Alice. Of must be of the simplest character. I think your father would be glad that his greatest hope was fulfilled. I am going to make preparations for our return, and you had better once for Arthur?"

"He will be here in an hour. I have a little time to consider, mother. I am sorrowful." Then she laid her head on her mother's breast, and was comforted as far as mother-love could comfort.

But her heart was heavy with the thought of trouble. For the past she had been conscious of some difference in her lover, a difference that scarcely be called a change, but might easily grow to change. I am going with the advent of Miss Leavenworth into Newport society. Adelaide Leavenworth had always been unfortunate to her. As girls in school, they had been constant rivals in every distinction, and Adelaide had won. She had an irrepressible rivalry, she was beautiful in a mode that is, she had style and charm, a preponderance of the nervous. Her dresses were marvellous, and she had a fortune in her own right that was more than equal to the grudging generosity of Nicholas Lloyd.

For two years the girls had been together, and then unexpectedly one night was promenading with Lord Medway. They came together face to face. "Alice!" cried Adelaide, with a light. "Is it really you?" And she received the introduction to Lord Medway, which was her object in spending the evening with Alice, and by one upward and downward glance, captured his curiosity and affection. After that meeting their intimacy grew rapidly, for either chance or arrangement had constantly thrown them together, and Alice had suffered of a sense of wrong she found it difficult to characterize. Now, if she had Newport she resigned the field to the enemy—for such she really felt to be—and she suffered in anticipation the little slings her clever sarcasm was sure to indulge itself in.

The only possible escape from the dilemma was her mother's suggestion, surely if Lord Medway was in England, would only be too glad to anticipate marriage day. But she did not find

THE LIBERTY.

Based on Law and Liberty Without Law.

C An illustration of false ideas of liberty is often met with when the moderate drinker is urged to sign a pledge. He objects because he wants to be free. He does not like to bind himself to a promise. Yet cases are known of the very same man who holds so precious a promise, and who is in an intolerable bondage to the habit of taking in, who is insidious and who has suddenly discovered when he tried to give up, supposing it would be very simple and easy that he was a slave, and his matter could not be changed. Like a child who insisted on being with fire, or with a lion, he finds that this liberty, which he would not give up, may work infinite mischief to him. We boast, and we live in a free country, yet how far we are from being able to do all we choose. When a man is told to steal, or to murder, or to libel his neighbor, he finds that there are restrictions to his liberty. He is free of countries, but he cannot do as he likes with his own. He attempts to build a factory on his own land, or let him build a house with windows overlooking his neighbor's premises. He discovers that he cannot do as he likes even with his own property. We are free to manage our own affairs, but for the general welfare we have restrictions on our action. The law we have made, interfering with its "Thou shalt not," and it is armed with power to enforce its prohibition. Thus law is compatible with liberty; indeed, liberty is based on law. No man is an enemy of society who wishes to live in a country where there is no law. Liberty, then, does not consist in the absence of restrictions. The men who prize liberty most, are the men who would resist to the death legislation tending to restrict. A most undesirable condition would be a land in which each did that which was right in his own eyes. But it is possible to conceive a condition in which liberty is liberty where there is no law. If we could suppose that there was no man on earth who would voluntarily wrong or injure his neighbor, or encroach on public or private property, we might be able to do without law. Our knowledge of human nature leads us now to rely on law as a necessary restriction on its propensities, but if we had a community where human nature is elevated of those propensities, there would be no occasion for law. It is with a child. In his youth restrictions and compulsion were applied at every moment when the child grows to maturity, having been well trained, the law of the household becomes unnecessary. The mother knows that his son will do without the things the law would prescribe. It is what Christ taught in his argument with the Jews. (John 8: 30-40.) Thus we attain true liberty. When our nature is so transformed that we do not feel the restrictions of God's law; when our nature has become so much like the nature that we spontaneously do the things required by the divine law, then we have the perfect law of liberty and are free indeed.

REST WITH JESUS.

FOLD me, precious Jesus,
To thy gentle breast;
Let me on thy bosom
Find my perfect rest.
O, how worn and weary
Grow my bruised feet
On life's road; but Jesus,
Thou art my retreat.

Let me sit, dear Saviour,
Tranquil at thy feet;
Finding in thy shadow,
Refuge safe and sweet.
Broken is my spirit,
Fallen is my pride;
I would find my solace,
Jesus, at thy side.

"Come," thou saidst, dear Jesus,
"Unto me and rest."
I have come, my Saviour,
Fold me to thy breast.
Torments surging, sweeping,
Give me no alarm,
When I feel about me,
Thy protecting arm.

A RICH MAN'S PRAYER.

LORD, thou art good and doest good.
Of countless gifts the Giver;
And none have greater cause than I
To praise thy name forever.
But, Lord, thou claim'st deeds, not words.
Thou bid'st us love our brother,
And show our grateful love to thee
By loving one another.

Then, Lord, if any love of mine
Can make a life the brighter;
If any little help of mine
Can make a heart the lighter;
If any gift of mine may ease
The burden of another.
God, give me love, and care, and heart
To help a toiling brother.

If any hoarded gold of mine
Can help a fellow creature;
Can to the body send relief,
Or to the soul a teacher;
Lord, help me make the sacrifice,
And I shall be the better;
And, while my brother reaps the good,
Thou mak'st thyself my debtor.

TWO WITNESSES.

Testimony Bravely Given for God by Martyr Preachers.

BY MRS. M. BAXTER.*

AND I will give unto my two witnesses. The Speaker is the same who gave the command to the Apostle.

"Rise and measure the temple of God." He speaks as though these two mysterious beings were the only witnesses on whom he could depend. They prophesy during the time of Antichrist's authority. (Rev. 13: 5.) They prophesy in sackcloth. Unflinching they will be; men of righteousness and judgment, on Old Testament lines. They do not show love to their enemies; the fire which proceeds out of their mouth devours any man who desires to hurt them. Invincible in themselves during their days of prophecy, unflinching in their testimony, these men who, it would seem, prepare the way for the national conversion of Israel, witness as prophets during the whole three and a-half years of the Antichrist's reign. They have "the power to shut the heaven that it rain not during the days of their prophecy, and they have power over waters to turn them to blood and to smite the earth with every plague as often as they desire."

These men are called "the two olive-trees and the two candlesticks, standing before the Lord of the earth;" they are also called "prophets." At the end of their time of testimony they seem invincible, the Antichrist overcomes and kills them: they are found to be mortal; and yet, after three and a-half days they rise again. "Darkness shall cover the earth, and gross darkness the people" in those days of awful terror. But God will have two men who will stand by him—two anointed ones, "two candlesticks," shining with an independent light when no outward Church will be able to exist, all through the reign of fearful darkness. When the Antichrist shall compel all who dwell on the earth to worship him; (Rev. 13: 15-17.) God in his mercy will still keep him a witness alive on earth; and probably those who shall be beheaded who will not worship the beast or his image, nor receive his mark on their foreheads or on their hands (Rev. 20: 4), will be the fruit of the prophesying of these two men.

Can we identify them? The question arises whether they are Moses and Elijah, who appeared in glory on the mount of transfiguration, or Enoch and Elijah.

The ministry of Elijah the prophet, as foretold by Malachi, has yet to be fulfilled. It is a striking fact that the Jews, up to the present day, in their observance of the Passover feast, place a cup of wine for the coming Elijah, and leave the door open; it is also a striking fact that a number of the early fathers of the Christian Church believed that Elijah and Enoch should come again and seal their testimony with their blood during the days of Antichrist. Enoch and Elijah are the only two men who have never died; they stand as those shall "stand before the Son of Man" who shall "prevail to escape those things which shall come to pass" in the time of trouble (Luke 21: 36). "It is appointed unto men once to die" (Heb. 9: 27); but these two witnesses stand before the Lord of the earth—not resurrection men, but mortals who have escaped death.

A Bowery Transformation.

Once a Notorious Resort, Gombossy's is now a Gospel Mission Restaurant.

EVERYBODY in New York, and many elsewhere, have heard or read of "Gombossy's place," on the Bowery. It was a place where the low life of the metropolis could be seen, and it was noted all over the east side. It had repeatedly been a subject of police consideration. All this is now changed, and at No. 55 Bowery, a new order of things has come to pass. It was formerly known as The Columbia Music Hall and was for years a source of large income to its conductors. There were few places, even on the Bowery, that could compare with it in notoriety. It had a bar-room, and a concert stage with rooms behind the scenes, and it was a "Raines law" hotel. But like every other concern of the kind, it reached the end of its rope at last and the place, after having been officially closed by the sheriff, is now undergoing a thorough moral and material cleansing. There is no longer a gin palace, flaunting its allurements in the faces of pedestrians, and the characteristic crowd of loungers has disappeared. The place has been leased by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and is now being remodelled with a view to opening it as an adjunct of the Bowery Mission, which has stood these eighteen years as a Gospel light-house for the moral shipwrecks of the Bowery. It will be opened as a cheap restaurant, at which the very poor and the homeless will be fed at nominal cost. The transformation is now taking place under the supervision of Superintendent Wyburn of the Bowery Mission, who says:

"One of the necessary things for the class of men found on the Bowery, is to get good, honest food cheap. This want is now supplied by the Bowery Mission Restaurant. Nowhere is there a place where such wholesome, yet cheap food is to be had. In a few weeks we shall open our new restaurant with accommodations to feed five thousand men a day. The quality of the food as well as the quantity, will be quite satisfactory, and a man with only a nickel will be able to get a good substantial meal. For five cents we shall serve a bowl of coffee, three slices of bread, oatmeal and milk, or pork and beans, beef stew, or cornbeef hash. Coffee and bread go with each order. For ten cents we shall serve a regular dinner: soup, roast or steak, two kinds of vegetables, bread with coffee or milk, and dessert. We often hear the exclamation, 'God bless you!' The best food I ever had anywhere for the money. Don't see how you do it.' It is a part of the Master's work worthy of encouragement, and calling for gratitude as well as for prayers that God may bless the further efforts of the Bowery Mission."

Scrofula Tumors

Broke Out and Caused Intense Suffering--Hood's Sarsaparilla Keeps the Blood Pure.

"Several years ago I had scrofula, which appeared in tumors in different parts of my body. It took five weeks for them to develop so they could be lanced and I suffered immensely. Physicians failed to cure me. After three years of great suffering the trouble began to disappear and my tumors were consumed. I read of cures of scrofula by Hood's Sarsaparilla and prepared six bottles. After taking a few bottles I felt better. I continued until I was completely cured. I have never been troubled with scrofula since that time. Hood's Sarsaparilla keeps my blood pure in spring and fall." MRS. SARAH G. DAVIS, Richmond, Ill.

Poor Blood

When a horse is poor in flesh, a new harness won't give him strength. If a house is cold new furniture won't warm it. If your strength is easily exhausted; work a burden; nerves weak; digestion poor; muscles soft; if you are pale and worn out, the trouble is with the blood. It is not so much IMPURE blood as POOR blood. Pills won't make this blood rich; nor will bitters, nor iron tonics, any more than a new harness will give strength to the horse, or new furniture will make a house warm. For poor blood you want something that will make rich blood.

OUR $5 GIFT

If, like dry goods merchants, we could mail samples of our goods, we'd soon revolutionize the present system of selling furniture. Too bulky for mailing, yet we MUST get samples out somehow. In no other way can we prove that our plan of selling the product of our big factory direct to the user means a saving in cost of 25 to 50 per cent. You won't believe so strong a statement on our mere say so. We must demonstrate it. It is our purpose to do this. Read the following remarkable offer.

Our price for any article shown below is from $5 to $10 under retail value. These are fair samples of our goods and prices. We want to place one of these samples in your home, and don't want a cent of pay for 30 days. Take your choice. In addition, we'll send, absolutely free, an elegant quadruple silver plated teapot, exactly as shown in the accompanying photographic illustration, warranted to wear for 10 years. With every one of them we send the manufacturers' 10-year warranty. We hope you won't mistrust the value of this grand souvenir just because we're giving it away. We guarantee it to be worth at least $5 retail. It doesn't belong to the cheap class of plated goods.

Orders will be accepted from readers of this paper with the understanding that bill will be due in 30 days from date of shipment if goods are fully equal to our representations and satisfactory in every respect; if not, furniture and teapot to be held subject to our order, and we'll pay return transportation charges.

PLEASE NOTE.—This being an introductory offer, made solely with the view to advertise our victorious plan of factory-to-fireside shipments, we don't wish to ship more than one of these samples (with the teapot) to the same person, nor can we hold this offer open long. Better order to-day, NOW, while you think of it. We want YOUR name on our list of permanent customers. In ordering, all that's necessary is to say you're a reader of this paper, that you accept our Sample Offer No. 1, 2, 3 or 4, as the case may be, and give full shipping directions. Shipments may be made from our Chicago warehouses or from the factory. Purchaser pays freight from the nearer point only.

OFFER No. 4.—This luxurious couch, upholstered in the finest grade of imported figured corduroy, any color, full size, 27x72 in.; spring edge. Retail value, $16.00. Our price, WITH THE TEAPOT, $9.00.

Artistic Originality

in Dress

THE correct construction of a costume according to one's own ideas can best be accomplished at home by one's self. The most convenient stitching mechanism for the purpose is the Singer Automatic, making the single-thread chain-stitch. Its simplicity of parts, easy operation, and the excellence of its work, specially commend its use to the dilettante dressmaker desiring to express her artistic perceptions in the most appropriate form.

Having all the advantages claimed for other "automatic" sewing-machines, the Silent Singer has many points of preference that can easily be demonstrated by comparison. Of faultless construction and finish, it is absolutely the lightest-running, the simplest and most compact. It is more easily threaded, and its parts are better protected from dust. The broad treadle better Promotes the Health and Comfort of the operator, because it is lower and the position of the feet can be changed at will. These points are worthy careful consideration by those of delicate health or unaccustomed to continuous use of a sewing machine.

The Globe's Greatest Railway.

In the year 1900 the Trans-Siberian Railroad will be finished and it will then be possible to travel around the world in thirty days. This railroad, which extends from the Ural Mountains to the Pacific Ocean, a distance of 3,600 miles, and from St. Petersburg to Vladivostok on the Pacific Ocean, a distance of 7,500 miles, will be the longest railroad system in the world, and fully twice as long as any of the Pacific systems in our land, which hitherto have been the longest. Large sections of this road east of the Ural Mountain chain, and westward from the Pacific have already been completed, and the rest is being pushed rapidly. Inclement weather and heavy snows, such as at certain times stop traffic altogether on the Pacific roads, are exceedingly rare in Siberia and occur only in limited distances. The average winter temperature along the line of the road is but little below zero. The atmosphere is very dry and only occasionally is the snow fall very deep. Blizzards are entirely unknown. Prince Hiko, who recently traveled through North America in order to study the railroad system, declared that after the completion of this road it would be possible to make the journey around the world in thirty-three days.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

Frank O. S., Deshler, O. What reasons have you for your belief that the Holy Spirit is a Person?

There are many reasons, but the chief one is the terms Christ applied to him. One of the most emphatic expressions is that in John 16:7-15, in which Christ speaks of the Holy Spirit in a manner inconsistent with the idea of his not being a person.

Reader, Dayton, O. Is it true, as I have heard asserted, that President McKinley was personally opposed to the costly inaugural ball and reception, but was overruled?

Quite true. In justice to President McKinley who has been criticised for allowing his inauguration to be celebrated by a grand ball, it should be known that as early as January 23d, he protested against the wasteful expenditure, and even went so far as to suggest the causes to which the money that had been raised might be given. Christian people all over the land will regret that the committee in charge of the inauguration ceremonies did not accede to the President's request. In his letter which the President sent to the Inaugural Committee, he said:

It is unbearable for me to think of such a vast amount of money ($50,000) being devoted to no more substantial purpose than display and pleasure, when there are millions of our brethren throughout the world actually suffering, starving, dying from lack of food, clothing, and shelter.

He then suggests that they abandon the plans for the ball, devote $25,000 to the alleviation of wretchedness in the great cities of the United States, $10,000 to provide food and shelter for persecuted Armenians, and $15,000 to relieve the horrors of plague and famine in India.

M. S., Pittsfield, Ill. How may selfishness best be eradicated?

By seeking every opportunity to do good to others, even at the cost of self-sacrifice. This is the simplest service and with prayer, will do more to overcome the habit of selfishness than any other means that may be employed.

"Reader," Galt, Ont. I professed conversion some years ago, but am now living without prayer, and with no interest in any Christian work. Ought I to absent myself from communion?

We would rather counsel you to resume prayer and seek to get right with God. See your pastor tell him frankly your condition. He may be able to help you. It would be a mockery for you to join with Christ's followers in the solemn commemoration if you do not love the Lord. If your child asked you whether he ought to stay away from school because his hands and face were dirty, would you not tell him to wash them and go to school?

A. M., Greensboro. My wife and myself are Christians, and I love her. Sometimes when ill, she insists on attending church if I do, which frequently causes me to remain home. Should I go as a matter of duty, she says I am inconsistent to drag her out, that "I ought to know she will go if I go." She discourages activity on my part visiting the poor, etc. She is frequently unpleasant without assigning a reason beyond despondency. At such times I endeavor to be with her, but it is irritating in the extreme to be a cause of irritation or cruelty. If I glance over a paper or book or even leave her room for a stroll over the lawn with my little boy, she cries, "why, if I speak kindly of her duty as a Christian she construes it that my admiration and affection have ceased and I am becoming hard-hearted. I am liked by her family, but it is very distressing to lead a life which seems to get worse year by year. Must I give up Christian activities, or what should I do?"

Doubtless what seems peevishness or irritability is due to some weakness or disordered nervous condition. Change of scene, combined with kindness and a strengthening regimen, might be an efficient aid in such a case. What is needed first of all is sound medical advice. Then try to interest her in your own Christian work, and once interested, she will take as much pleasure in it as you do yourself. By no means think of giving up your Christian work, rather try to induce her to share it. You have been drifting away from each other, and you must now show, by a renewed interest that you desire her to share all your activities. Should you conquer her indifference both your lives will be brightened. Strive to do this and pray for it. It is well worth trying.

Reader, Newport, N. Y. What really is apparent in that the wife of Luther brought an inheritance to Saul in 1 Samuel 18:16?

After reading this chronicle's account in the Bible, you will know all that can be known on the subject. You must remember that Saul did not see it, but recognized Saul in the woman's somewhat vague description. If the Jewish tradition is true that the woman was the mother of Abner, she would know enough of the situation and circumstances to deceive the king if she were so disposed.

Mrs. M. A. McK., Seven Mile, O. Who is the author of the saying, "Robbing Peter to pay Paul?"

On the 17th of December, 1540, the abbey church of St. Peter, Westminster, was advanced to the dignity of a cathedral by letters patent; but ten years later it was joined to the diocese of London again, and many of its estates were appropriated to the repairs of St. Paul's cathedral. Hence the saying in question.

S. B. Z., Mennu, Pa. 1. What prophecies remain to be fulfilled before the millennium? 2. What is to be understood by the tree whose leaves are for the healing of the nations? Rev. 22:2, 3. What do you think is the greatest impediment to progress in the divine life?

The prophecies of Christ's second coming, the rise of Antichrist and the great Tribulation all of which will precede the millennium. 2. Several meanings have been suggested, and there is a wide difference of opinion. The that the Mohammedan empire should not be dismembered. In the event of a war, they anticipate a general break-up of Turkey and such a re-adjustment of territorial lines as would involve widespread disturbance among themselves. It is hardly necessary to add that their defense of Turkey is wholly selfish, and condemned by all righteous men. 2. Andromache was the legendary wife of Hector, whose feats are recorded in the Iliad. Her father and seven brothers fell by the sword of Achilles. She is usually delineated by poets as a most affectionate wife, and the farewell scene between herself and Hector is the subject of a famous painting.

Mrs. S. A. T., Bedias, Texas. Who was Torquemada, and where can his story be found?

Tomas de Torquemada was the noted Inquisitor General for Castile and Leon, Spain, in the 15th century. His connection with the Inquisition won him an unenviable fame. His biography can be found in almost any encyclopedia.

Blanche Ewing, New York City. 1. What authority is there for your statement in the Lesson Points that Queen Candace was converted under the preaching of the Eunuch? (Acts 8:26-40). 2. What authority is there for the statement I have seen in The Sunday School Times that Acts 8:37 should not be included in the text? 3. Why is it contended, in spite of the very detailed account that the Eunuch may have been baptized by sprinkling or pouring?

1. We did not say that the queen was converted, but that there was a tradition to that effect. It is mentioned by Ludolf in his "History of Ethiopia." 2. No authority is necessary. The verse is not in the most ancient manuscripts of the Bible. It was added at a later date by some one who thought Philip would not baptize the Eunuch without such an avowal. The verse does not appear in the revised version. 3. The mode of baptism is not they labor, have found in every instance among the rudest tribes, evidences of a feeling and a tendency to worship a or inanimate things. The apprehension of a superior order of beings seems to be a trait in the human race everywhere.

George J. O., Otto, N. C. Who was it who dipped in a river so that he became invulnerable, and where did it happen?

The story to which you refer is that of Achilles, the son of Peleus and Thetis. According to the legend, his mother, in order to make him invulnerable and proof against wounds, dipped him in the river Styx, holding him by the heel. Although his entire was thus covered, the heel remained vulnerable, and he was afterwards killed by an arrow from the bow of Paris, which struck that vulnerable spot.

Sister, Goffs, Kansas. When did Saul first take the name of Paul?

When or why he received the Roman name, which he bears in the Acts of the Apostles, and which he uses in the Epistles, which Peter addresses him, is unknown. It is probable that his father gave him both names, knowing that he was a Roman citizen, as a Jew. While the apostle lived in Jerusalem and mixed in Jewish society, he naturally used the Hebrew name of Saul when, after his call at Antioch, he set his foreign tour, he would use the Latin of Paul, which would be more in harmony with his claims to Roman citizenship.

Carry S., Iowa, La. Where is the corn which is to be sent to India in the vessels of the Government?

It is now being forwarded by voluntary contributors, farmers and other good people over the country. They gather the sacks, place it on the cars, and when full of old corn, they notify the Fund Committee, 92 Bible House, New York, which arranges for transportation.

Mrs. J. R. G., Henry, Tenn. The Legislature now in session, has incorporated the Centennial Grounds and legalized the intoxicants. As this has been done, is it wrong for Christian people to visit the Centennial?

While it is greatly to be regretted if the Legislature should have granted this session, we do not consider it sufficient ground for advising any one to stay away from the Centennial. If a strong protest were made, it might result in the Legislature reconsidering its action. In any event, Christians should find some way of recording their approval.

H., Dry Creek, W. Va. Can a person who is a victim of the morphine habit and make a tempt to give it up, live a Christian life?

We must give up our besetting sins, indulgences, and present the body a fit temple for Christ, if we mean to live the Christian life in earnest. One who strives in vain, strives half-heartedly to give up his sin, may be a Christian, but can only be of a very poor sort. Still, we are not to condemn. Let such a one cease rely on his own strength, and earnestly believe, ask the Lord to take away the sinful habit, and strength will be given him to overcome it.

A NAVAL ORANGE TREE, IN CALIFORNIA, IN FULL BEARING.

This tree, which is one of a grand group in an orchard in the Redlands district, is about twelve or fifteen years old. It yields a crop of eight or ten boxes of splendid fruit, selling for $1 to $1.50 per box. This class of fruit is of all sizes, and in assorting it, it is graded into different sizes by machinery.

most probable, in our opinion, is that it has a reference to the tree in the Garden of Eden, and intimates that man will have free access to the renewing and invigorating power which is represented (Gen. 3:22-24) as being withheld from him at the fall. The seer seems to have believed that the tree of life would be an antidote to the ravages of sin, and that a man converted, say, at the close of a long life of dissipation would have this means of restoring spiritual vitality. The people of his time had a belief that there was, somewhere in nature, some medicine which they called the elixir of life, which would cure any disease, by increasing the natural power of life. 3. Selfishness, as seen in the many forms of competition and ambition. Next to this physical indulgence in drunkenness, gluttony and sensuality.

Olive, R. S., Ohl, Pa., in behalf of the "Shut-ins," sends us this note for Margaret E. Sangster:

Please accept thanks for your cheery talk with "Shut-ins." I have been a "Shut-in" for sixteen years, and your sweet, sympathetic words went right home to my heart of hearts, and inspired me to live on bravely, and to do, or rather to suffer my part with Christian fortitude.

J. L. M., Attrick, Va. 1. Why is it that the five powers of Europe have combined to aid the Mohammedans against the Greeks and Christians, while pretending to be Christians themselves? 2. Who was Andromache? We have her portrait in our parlor.

1. The powers have put themselves in the incongruous attitude of defending Moslems against Greeks and Christians on the pretext that it is necessary for the peace of Europe stated, and it is, therefore, open to people with decided opinions to contend for them if they deem the matter important. The Greek phrase stating that Philip and the Eunuch went "down into the water," may be translated "down to the water," although the rendering "into the water," is preferred by the revisers, and is considered by scholars more accurate.

M. R., Hamerton, Ia. If a Baptist minister is requested to hold a funeral service by a Christian science family, the service to consist of the reading of a specified chapter of the Bible, and the reciting of the Lord's Prayer, would it be his duty to accede to the request?

The clergyman would be a better judge than we can be of his duty. There might be circumstances in connection with the case, which we do not know, that ought to be taken into account in reaching a decision. We believe, however, that a minister receiving such a request, would comply with it if he could do so, and would not allow any trivial objections to prevent his doing something that would be a comfort to an afflicted family.

Joel C., Sierra City, Cal. Is there a people in Africa without a God, living no religion, or any conception of a Supreme Being, and if so, what people is it, and where located?

Some travelers tell of tribes in Africa that seem to have no religion or idea of a Supreme Being, but their stories are not well authenticated, and have probably been told without due investigation. On the other hand, missionaries who have leisure to examine into the spiritual condition of the people among whom

It is a very striking building and will, undoubtedly, attract great attention. And then there are several other buildings, all works of art and all extremely interesting, and each with a marked individuality of its own. In the grounds an endless number of attractive features have been introduced. First, there are the two beautiful lakes. Watauga and Katherine, two sheets of clear sparkling water. The music is to be a special attraction, and the world's greatest organists will officiate at the grand organ. The doors will be thrown open May 1, and the Exposition will close October 31.

An Armenian Woman's Mission

Rebecca H Kurkjian is a bright, educated young Armenian who has come to America to labor in behalf of her persecuted brothers and sisters at home. She is a graduate of the American College for Girls at Scutari, and was compelled by the Armenian troubles to leave all and seek a foreign land, where, fortunately, she has made many friends. She has already delivered addresses in a number of churches and before different societies, and has made a remarkably good impression everywhere. Rev. Dr. Farnsworth, American missionary in Turkey, now in the United States, Rev. Mr. Blackburn, of the Church of the Strangers, New York City, and many other pastors unite in recommending her to churches for addresses. The proceeds of her work are devoted to aiding the orphans of Armenia.

A RESURRECTION MISTAKE.

A Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., } She supposing him to be the on the Text: John 20: 15: - - - } gardener.

HERE are Mary Magdalen and Christ, just after his resurrection. For four thousand years a grim and ghastly tyrant had been killing people and dragging them into his cold palace.

He had a passion for human skulls. For forty centuries he had been unhindered in his work. He had taken down kings and queens and conquerors, and those without fame. In that cold palace there were shelves of skulls, and pillars of skulls, and altars of skulls, and even the chalices at the table were made of bleached skulls. To the skeleton of Abel he had added the skeleton of all the ages, and no one had disputed his right until one Good Friday, about eighteen hundred and sixty-seven years ago, as near as I can calculate it, a mighty stranger came to the door of that awful palace, rolled back the door, and went in, and seizing the tyrant threw him to the pavement and put upon the tyrant's neck the heel of triumph.

There are three or four things which the world and the Church have not noticed in regard to the resurrection of Christ. First, our Lord in gardener's attire. Mary Magdalen, grief-struck, stands by the rifled sarcophagus of Christ, and turns around, hoping she can find the track of the sacrilegious resurrectionist who has despoiled the grave, and she finds some one in working apparel come forth as if to water the flowers, or uproot the weeds from the garden, or set to reclaiming the fallen vine—some one in working apparel, his garments perhaps having the sign of the dust and the dirt of the occupation.

Mary Magdalen, on her face the rain of a fresh shower of weeping, turns to this workman, and charges him with the desecration of the tomb, when lo! the stranger responds, flinging his whole soul into one word which trembles with all the sweetest rhythm of earth and heaven, saying, "Mary!" In that peculiarity of accentuation all the incognito fell off, and she found that instead of talking with an humble gardener of Asia Minor, she was talking with Him who owns all the hanging gardens of heaven. Constellations of clusters of forget-me-nots, the sunflower the chief of all, the morning sky and midnight aurora, flaring terraces of beauty, blazing like a summer wall with coronation roses and giants of battle, blessed and glorious mistake of Mary Magdalen, "She supposing him to be the gardener." What does that mean? It means that we have an everyday Christ for everyday work in everyday apparel. Not on Sabbath morning in our most seemly apparel are we more attractive to Christ, than we are in our everyday work dress, managing our merchandise, sniting our anvil, ploughing our field, tending the flying shuttles, mending the garments for our household, providing food for our families, or toiling with weary pen, or weary pencil, or weary chisel. A working day Christ in working-day apparel for us in our everyday toil. Put it to the highest strain of this Easter anthem, "Supposing him to be the gardener."

Roll it down in comfort all through these aisles. A working day Christ in working-day apparel. Tell it in the darkest corridor of the mountain to the poor miner. Tell it to the factory maid in most unventilated establishment at Lowell or Lancaster. Tell it to the cluster of roughest new ground in Western wilderness. Tell it to the sewing woman, a stitch in the needle for every stitch in the garment some of their cruel employers paying no right to think that they will get through the door of heaven any more than they could through the eye of a broken needle which has just dropped on the bare floor from the pricked and bleeding fingers of the consumptive sewing girl. Away with your talk about hypostatic union, and soteriology of the Council of Trent, and the metaphysics of religion which would freeze practical Christianity out of the world; but pass along this gardener's coat to all nations that they may touch the hem of it and feel the thrill of the Christly brotherhood.

Oh, that is what helped Joseph Wedgwood, toiling amid the heat and the dust of the potteries, until he could make for Queen Charlotte the first royal table service of English manufacture. That was what helped James Watt, scoffed at and caricatured, until he could put on wheels the thunderbolt of power which roars by day and by night in every furnace of the locomotive engines of America. That is what helped Hugh Miller, toiling amid the quarries of Cromarty, until every rock became to him a volume of the world's biography, and he found the footstone.

Oh, the world wants a Christ for the steps of the Creator in the old red sand office, a Christ for the kitchen, a Christ for the shop, a Christ for the banking house, a Christ for the garden, while spading and planting and irrigating the territory. Oh, of course, we want to see Christ at last in royal robe and bediamonded, a celestial equestrian mounting the white horse, but from this Easter of 1897 to our last Easter on earth we most need to see Christ as Mary Magdalen saw him at the daybreak, "supposing him to be gardener."

Another thing which the church and the world have not noticed in regard to the resurrection of Christ is that he made his first post-mortem appearance to one who had been the seven-deviled Mary Magdalen. One would have supposed he would have made his first posthumous appearance to a woman who had always been illustrious for goodness. There are saintly women who have always been saintly, saintly in girlhood, saintly in infancy, always saintly. In nearly all our families there have been saintly aunts. In my family circle it was saintly aunt Phebe; in yours saintly aunt Martha or saintly aunt Ruth. One always saintly. But not so was the one spoken of in the text.

While you are not to confound her with the repentant courtesan who had made her long locks do the work of towel at Christ's footwashing, you are not to forget that she was exorcised of seven devils. What a capital of demonology she must have been. What a chorus of all diabolism. Seven devils—two for the eyes, and two for the hands, and two for the feet, and one for the tongue. Seven devils. Yet all these are extirpated, and now she is as good as once she was bad, and Christ honors her with the first posthumous appearance. What does that mean?

Why, it means for worst sinner greatest grace; it means those lowest down shall come, perhaps, highest up; it means that the clock that strikes twelve at midnight may strike twelve at noon; it means that the grace of God is seven times stronger than sin. The most of the Christian women in our day would have nothing to do with Mary Magdalen even after her conversion, lest somehow they be compromised. The only thing I have to say against women is that they have not enough mercy for Mary Magdalen. Christ put all pathos, and all reminiscence, and all anticipation, and all pardon, and all comfort, and all heaven into one word of four letters, "Mary!" Mark you, Christ did not appear to some Bible Elizabeth, or Bible Hannah, or Bible Esther, or Bible Deborah, or Bible Vashti, but to Mary; not to a Mary against whom nothing was said, not to Mary the mother of Jesus, not to Mary the mother of James, not to Mary the sister of Lazarus, but to a seven-deviled Mary.

There is a man seven-deviled—devil of avarice, devil of pride, devil of hate, devil of indolence, devil of falsehood, devil of strong drink, devil of impurity. God can take them all away, seven or seventy. I rode over the new cantilever bridge that spans Niagara—a bridge 900 feet long, 850 feet of chasm from bluff to bluff. I passed over it without any anxiety. Why? Because twenty-two locomotives and twenty-two cars laden with gravel, had tested the bridge, thousands of people standing on the Canadian side, thousands standing on the American side to applaud the achievement. And however long the train of our immortal interests may be we are to remember that God's bridge of mercy spanning the chasm of sin has been fully tested by the awful tonnage of all the pardoned sin of all the ages, church militant standing on one bank, church triumphant standing on the other bank. Oh, it was to the seven-deviled Mary that Christ made his first post-mortem appearance.

There is another thing that the world and the church have not observed in regard to this resurrection, and that is, it was the morning twilight.

If the chronometer had been invented and Mary had as good a watch as some of the Marys of our time have, she would have found it was about half past five o'clock a. m. Matthew says it was in the dawn; Mark says it was at the sunrising; Luke says it was very early in the morning; John says it was while it was yet dark. In other words, it was twilight. That was the o'clock at which Mary Magdalen mistook Christ for the gardener. What does that mean? It means there are shadows over the grave unlifted, shadows of mystery that are hovering. Mary stooped down and tried to look to the other end of the crypt. She gave hysteric outcry. She could not see to the other end of the crypt. Neither can you see to the other end of the grave of your dead. Neither can we see to the other end of our own grave. Oh, if there were shadows over the family plot belonging to Joseph of Arimathea, is it strange that there should be some shadows over our family lot? Easter dawn, not Easter noon.

Shadow of unanswered question! Why were they taken away from us? why were they ever given to us if they were to be taken so soon? why were they taken so suddenly? why could they not have uttered some farewell words? why? A short question, but a whole crucifixion of agony in it. Why? Shadow on the graves of good men and women who seemed to die before their work was done. Shadow on all the graves of children because we ask ourselves why so beautiful a craft launched at all if it was to be wrecked one mile outside of the harbor? But what did Mary Magdalen have to do in order to get more light on that grave. She had only to wait. After a while the Easter sun rolled up, and the whole place was flooded with light. What have you and I to do in order to get more light on our own graves and light upon the graves of our dear loved ones? Only to wait.

Charles Fifth of Spain with his servants and torches went down into the vault of the necropolis where his ancestors were buried, and went deeper, further on until he came to a cross around which were arranged the caskets of his ancestors. He also found a casket containing the body of one of his own family. He had that casket opened, and there by embalmer's art he found that the body was as perfect as eighteen years before when it was entombed. But under the exploration his body and mind perished. Oh, my friends, do not let us morbidly struggle with the shadows of the sepulchre. What are we to do? Wait. It is not the evening twilight that gets darker and darker. It is the morning twilight that gets brighter and brighter into the perfect day. I preach it to-day. Sunrise over Pere le Chaise, sunrise over Greyfriars Churchyard, sunrise over Greenwood, over Woodlawn, over Laurel Hill, over Mount Auburn, over Congressional Burying Ground, sunrise over every country graveyard, sunrise over the catacombs, sunrise over the sarcophagi where the ships lie buried. Half past five o'clock among the tombs now, but soon to be the noonday of explanation and beatitude. It was in the morning twilight that Mary Magdalen mistook Christ for a gardener.

Another thing the world and the Church have not observed; that is, Christ's thetic credentials. How do you know he was a gardener? His garments were a gardener. The flakes of turned earth scattered upon his girdle said he was a gardener. How do you know he was not a gardener? Ah! Easter had gone by he gave to some of his disciples his three credentials showed them his hands and his feet. Three paragraphs written in right-angled pressed letters. A scar in the right palm, a scar in the left palm, a scar at the ribs—scars, scars. That is the way you know him. That is the way you will know him.

Ay, am I saying this morning to you when I say that will be one of the things in which you and I will know each other by the scars of earth; scars of aches, scars of sickness, scars of persecution, scars of hard work, scars of battle of old age. When I see Christ's re-erected body having scars, it makes me think that our remodelled and resuscitated bodies will have scars. Why beget out of this world some of us covered with scars all over. Heaven not be a bay into which float yachts after a pleasuring, with the rigging and with the embroidered sails as when they were first unfurled. It will be more like a navy yard men-of-war come in from Trafalgar, Lepanto, men-of-war with masts by a cyclone, men-of-war struck sides by seventy-four pounders, war with decks scorched of the Old Constitution, old Constellation floating in discharged from service forever. In the resurrection Christ denuded by scars. You and I are credentialed, and will recognize each other by scars. Do you think them now figurement? Do you think them badge of endurance? I tell you a serious thought this morning, they are to be the means of heavenly recognition.

There is one more thing that the world and the Church have not noticed in regard to the resurrection of Christ, and that is, Christ from Friday to Sabbath was less in a hot climate where sanitation demanded that burial take place the same day as death, and where there was no ice to retard dissolution. Yet three days he comes up so healthy, robust, and so rubicund. Mary Magdalen takes him for a gardener. Not supposing him to be an invalid from a hospital, supposing him to be a corpse from a tomb, but supposing him to be the denuded, healthy by the breath of the turned sod, and by a perpetual life in sunshine.

Oh, the glorious thought, the consolation of this subject when Christ coming up without any of the lacerations, for you must remember he was lacerated and wounded fearfully by crucifixion—coming up without wounds. What does that make me think? The grave will get nothing of us except wounds and imperfections. Christ went into the grave exhausted and bloated. All the currents of his life had poured from his wounds. He had lived a life of trouble, sorrow, and privation, and he died a lingering death. His body hung on four spikes. No inventory of twenty years' suffering ever went into the grave so white and ghastly and laid down as Christ, and yet here he comes so rubicund and robust she supposes him to be the gardener.

Ah! all the side-aches, and the back-aches, and the heart-aches, and the ear will up without its heaviness, the eye will up without its dimness, the lung will come up without oppressed respiration. Oh, what races we will run when we come immortal athletes! Oh, what feats we will take when all earthly imperfections subtracted and all celestial qualities added we shall set up our residence in that city which, though vaster than the cities of this world, shall never have one obsequy!

Standing this morning round the entered masonry of our Lord's tomb, I tell you to a world without hearse, without muffled drum, without tumult, without catafalque, and without a tear. At the cathedrals of the blessed no longer Dead March in Saul, but whole libretto Hallelujah Chorus. Oh, put thumb and finger to key, and loving for against the bosom of a risen Christ, Hallelujah, Amen. Hallelujah, Amen!

THE MODERN JEW

IN HIS ANCESTRAL HOME

BY HON. SELAH MERRILL D.D. LL.D.

TURKISH JUSTICE.

Quality wholly Wanting—Examples of Oppression—How Crime is Concealed—Courts Controlled by Bribery.

Who go from Christian America to the empire of the Sultan we shall find that a number of words which we thought we understood fully, have quite a different meaning from what they have with us. We are not surprised that customs, dress, habits of life, and religious practices should differ from ours, but

AT THE CUSTOM HOUSE, JAFFA GATE.

When we come to the relations of man to man, our ideas of morality to matters pertaining to character and conduct, we are prepared for the wide difference which exists.

For example, our ideas of truth differ from those prevailing in Turkey. In the phrase "family life" conveys a meaning to us, while in Turkey the words are unknown and they convey no meaning whatever. Again, government implies a fostering care of the governed, in Turkey it means oppressing the governed. To govern means to rob, to be despotic and to oppose education and progress, to crush out of the minds of the governed all tendencies to think independently. No contrast is greater than that between the meaning of the word government as practically expounded in Turkey and as expounded in the United States.

Our idea of justice enters into all our public, social, religious, governmental, and into every relation between ourselves and our fellow-men. We have a standard of justice. The word is defined in our law. We know what the absence of principle means. Society is built upon this corner-stone. In Turkey this idea is wanting. I do not see how to qualify this statement by saying that it is wanting to a certain degree; it appears to be wholly wanting.

Our law that all male Moslems of the Sultan must do military service. Christian subjects are exempt from this duty, not as a favor because Christians are despised as "filthy dogs" not worthy to fight for the Faith and the Prophet, and in lieu of service they are obliged to pay an annual military tax. The Turks are glad to get a Christian's money although they despise him. This tax beginning at birth and continuing through life, is levied upon rich and poor alike and even the poor are not exempt. Let us admit that it is fair according to our view of justice, but the statement of the case is incomplete. Here is the strange part. A Christian or a Jew whose name is on the list as subject to this military tax, dies, and the government continues to collect the tax year after year. I have had many cases brought before me officially where a Christian or a Jew had gone to America, and resided in our country a number of years with no intention of returning to Turkey, whose friends in Jerusalem were compelled to pay for such persons the annual military assessment. The strangest cases are of such persons who have died in the United States and proof of death with all the legal documents confirmed by the Department of State, has been sent back and presented to the Turkish authorities but they would not accept it. The friends must continue to pay for the dead man who did not own even a grave in Turkey.

Possibly I ought to explain that both Jews and Christians are divided into small communities, the heads of which must pay such taxes for all that are enrolled, so that the individual himself never pays his tax in person. Were this the law, the Government would have a fine time hunting up its tax-payers, especially if they were dead.

The second fact to which I will refer is that of a man who was murdered about five miles from Jerusalem on the direct road to Nablous (Shechem). Hundreds of people pass along the road every day, chiefly peasants or country people on their way to market. This murder was committed in the night and the murdered man lay all the next day and till the afternoon of the day following before notice was given to the officials and the body removed. Everyone who passed saw the body, and the first question my readers ask is why they did not hurry to the city and tell about it? On the contrary not a word was spoken. Not a hand was extended to place a cloak or a bit of cloth-tion. A mound of stones in the road now marks the spot where the murder was committed, and where the poor man lay.

We thought that these peasants were guilty of inhumanity, but we find the trouble to be in the character of the Turkish government, it pretends to be just, but its ideas of justice are abominable.

Many instances have come under my own observation where persons who were perfectly innocent of any crime have been seized under some made-up charge and thrown into prison. Once in prison there is no thought or hope of vindication, nor is there any prospect of release without the payment of a large bribe to the officials. There are no other people on the globe who profess to have such an abhorrence of bribes as do the Turks; yet bribery is just as much a part of their life as is the air they breathe. There is not an official in that great empire who has not bought his position from those who had the power to confer it.

For a third illustration of the Turks' idea of justice I will speak of the system of impressment which prevails everywhere. I saw this in practice scores of times during the years when the carriage road between Jericho and Jerusalem was being constructed. The officials would go to a certain village and demand the services of so many persons, men, boys, and girls, for so many days or weeks as the case might be. These people must give this service entirely without pay, and without food furnished except bread and water. When camels in the region about Jerusalem would disappear in a night. The owners had run them off to prevent their being seized, and the soldiers had to go twenty or forty miles, perhaps, to secure the number they required. Boys and women scream and cry and men fight with the soldiers who are seizing the camels, but the soldiers take the animals by force, often beating the owners before they will give them up. In Turkey this is justice.

If a soldier wants a load of wood or a basket of vegetables he seizes them from some peasant who is coming to market, and there is no redress.

Again, telegraphic messages are, in our country, considered sacred. But in Jerusalem a copy of any message that is sent from the office can be obtained for a bribe of a shilling. That is Turkish justice.

Again, if I put a letter in the post office at Boston, directed to some one in San Francisco, the whole of the government is pledged to carry and deliver it safely to the person to whom it is addressed. No one except a properly authorized person dare touch it. In Turkey despatches are opened, private letters are read or destroyed, money is abstracted; the insecurity of the post is proverbial. This is Turkish justice. What a comment upon Turkish methods, what a severe rebuke to that government is the existence of foreign post offices in many of the large cities of the empire, established there by foreign governments because Turkey cannot be trusted to handle foreign mails.

Again, the custom house might be conducted, one would think, according to reasonable rules. On the contrary, laws are defied, arbitrary methods prevail, and bribery is universal. The property of foreigners is closely scrutinized, some of it is committed to the flames, some of it is confiscated, much of it, if not destroyed, is injured so as to be of little value to the owner. It seems, where the United States maintains friendly relations with a country and has treaty rights with the same, as if something might be done to prevent the outrages which are now common in the Turkish custom house.

The most prolific source of illustration for our subject is of course the Turkish courts, which I have not drawn upon for the reason that the specific instances that have come to my knowledge are so numerous. If a person carries a case to law he must be prepared to bribe its way from beginning to end and, if his opponent is able to pay larger bribes than himself, his case is sure to be lost. Without the payment of a great deal of money in bribes no case can be carried successfully through a Turkish court. I have known a decision reversed as many as four different times according as one party paid more money than the other.

In the case of land there are no records, no deeds, no boundaries, no titles that one can consider as certain. Money is powerful to change any or all of these things.

Turkey is a very unsafe country for money or investments of any kind; neither property nor life are secure, and human rights are not thought of.

SELAH MERRILL.

"THE PULPIT OF OMAR," JERUSALEM.

ing over the lifeless body. "How inhuman" is the exclamation I hear from every quarter. But before judging let us wait till we learn all the facts. The natives who passed by knew the Turkish government too well. They knew what its custom was and what had happened in similar cases. They knew that if they should report this murder to the officers in Jerusalem they would be seized and thrown into prison where they would linger and suffer for months and perhaps years, for they would be suspected at once of some complicity with the crime. The only safety was in silence or in feigned ignorance. It happened that an English missionary passed this spot near the close of the second day and reported the case to the authorities at Jerusalem and the body was removed. In this case there was no fear of arrest, for he was under English protection. Their time expired a similar demand was made upon another village.

This practice is universal among the soldiers. The government sanctions it. The peasants dread the soldiers because they are legalized robbers. Camels are needed or other beasts of burden, and soldiers are sent out to seize them. A small boy is leading home his father's camel, or a poor woman is coming to market with her camel loaded with bushes or sticks for fuel which she hopes to sell for a few cents.—no matter where camels are found or how necessary they are for the daily support of their owners, they are seized, over-laden, over-driven, poorly fed, and for this inconvenience and serious loss there is no compensation, and no redress. Several times I have known it to happen when it leaked out that the soldiers were going on some expedition, that all the

PAUL'S FIRST JOURNEY.

Sunday School Lesson for May 2.
Acts 13: 1-13. Golden Text, Mark
16: 5. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature (Mark 16: 15), was one of our Lord's last commands before his ascension into heaven. And this command was given in different words, on more than one occasion. "Go and teach all nations" (Matt. 28: 19). A certain order however was to be observed "beginning at Jerusalem" (Luke 24: 47), which is more explicitly stated (Acts 1: 8). "Ye shall receive power when the Holy Ghost is come upon you, and ye shall be my witnesses both in Jerusalem and in all Judea and Samaria, and unto the uttermost parts of the earth. But the Apostles had no indication as to when their ministry in Jerusalem should yield to the claims of "all Judea," and then "Samaria," and then the uttermost parts of the earth. The persecution following the martyrdom of Stephen was the means of scattering abroad the Christians who went everywhere preaching the Gospel (Acts 8: 4). The work of God through the ministry of Philip drew Peter and John to Samaria, but Peter needed a special revelation from God to persuade him that the Gospel was really for the Gentiles.

God does all things

In His Own Time :

To forestall him is to spoil the work; for we cannot force God's hand, but we may also injure his work by our failure to recognize when the right time is come. Blessed is he who has understanding of the times, and who knows how to be regulated by God's time in all things. "Prepare thy work without, and make it ready for thee in the field; and afterwards build thine house" (Prov. 24: 27), says the wise man. This is God's principle of action, he makes all ready and lets everything ripen before he goes forward. While he worked with Peter to create within him a oneness of heart with himself regarding the salvation of the Gentiles, he was working also in the same direction through other disciples. The persecuted converts whom Jerusalem had cast out, went as far as Antioch (in Syria) "preaching the word to Jews only;" but some of their converts "spoke to the Greeks also preaching the Lord Jesus" (Acts 11: 19-20) and a great number turned to the Lord.

This was reported to the church at Jerusalem, who sent forth Barnabas to Antioch that he might investigate and pronounce upon the movement. Led, no doubt, by the Spirit of God, he went to Tarsus to seek Paul and bring him into this atmosphere of spiritual awakening; the new disciples needed him and he needed the impetus which such a work of God would give him before his great missionary call which was to follow. God brought about that he should be in touch with the brethren at Jerusalem in causing that he and Barnabas should be the bearers of relief from the disciples at Antioch in view of a time of dearth which, through Agabus, had been foretold and came to pass soon after.

Returned again to Antioch from their ministry to the Church at Jerusalem, Barnabas and Saul with other prophets and teachers who were there "ministered to the Lord and fasted." The elders had a kind of intimation that God wanted some move forward. What should they do? They may have been full of work, but the conviction that God had something to say to them must take precedence of all else. So they came together to fast and place themselves at his disposal, willing to be broken off from any work, interrupted in any plans, called to, or taken off from, any service which the Lord might direct. Such a coming together to listen to the Lord marks an epoch in the history of the church. Before Christ chose his twelve disciples he remained all night in prayer to God (Luke 6: 12-13). And here we see that before the Holy Ghost sent out any missionaries to the heathen he also led the elders of the church at Antioch to seek in this solemn way to know the mind of God.

"My sheep hear my voice and I know them and they follow me" (John 10: 27). Those who are ready to follow are Quick to Hear.

The Holy Ghost, whose voice was familiar to these men who were filled with him, said to them: "Separate me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them." There was no question, no deputy or proconsul from the faith. But he knew not the odds which were against him, he had never before met with a man who was filled with the Holy Ghost. Paul fastened his eyes on him and said, "O, full of all guile and all villainy, thou son of the devil, thou enemy of all righteousness, wilt thou not cease to pervert the right ways of the Lord? And now, behold, the hand of the Lord is upon thee, and thou shalt be blind, not seeing the sun for a season." And immediately there fell upon him a mist and a darkness, and he went about seeking for some to lead him by the hand. The proconsul who had been attracted by the teaching of Paul, when he saw the Word confirmed by signs following as the Lord had promised (Matt. 16: 17, 8) believed, and a first-fruits among the Gentiles was thus given.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

EEPPLY interesting is the new departure described in the lesson. It gives a promise to the Church at Antioch, which is honored to this day. The Church was evidently an active, vigorous body of believers. The leaders, whose names are mentioned, are strangers to us, with the exception of Barnabas, whose name heads the list, and Saul, whose name closes it. We are not told what was the nature of the ministration mentioned in the second discussion as to their fitness, no calculation as to the finances; God had spoken, and it was enough. What a power for a missionary, "I am sent forth by the Holy Ghost! Not by my missionary society, nor by my church or denomination, but by God the Holy Ghost, whose call is my guarantee in every way." "All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth, go ye therefore" were our Lord's words, and the Holy Ghost in a missionary brings to remembrance and vitalizes these words. What and who can stand against a man thus equipped? Greater is he that is in us than he that is in the world (1 John 4: 4). Sailing to Cyprus they began their ministry at Salamis, going on their old lines of preaching the Gospel to Jews only. But when they had gone through the whole island to Paphos they found a certain sorcerer, a false prophet, whose name was Barjesus; which was with the proconsul, Sergius Paulus, a man of understanding. This man sought to hear the Word of God, and this was to them a distinct intimation that the time was come when they were to preach to the Gentiles also. But the sorcerer, who was in the service of the enemy, the prince of this world, withstood them. Satan would make all the opposition in his power to this new departure. Let not those think who go forth, led by the Holy Ghost, that therefore they will have no difficulties, and that all will be plain sailing. The God of this world has all his powers arrayed against those who truly follow Jesus. This man sought to turn away the verse, but, as fasting was connected with it, we presume it was an effort to obtain special guidance on some subject, probably this very question of a missionary expedition. It ended in a direct command to undertake the work. How it was communicated, whether by an audible voice, or by a vivid impression on the minds of the members, does not appear. It was, however, communicated in such a way as to leave no doubt of its being a divine command, and as such it was obeyed. Saul and Barnabas are to go among the Gentiles preaching Christ. Verse three says the Church sent them, but verse four says they were sent by the Holy Spirit. People who are fond of seeking contradictions in God's word have an opportunity for discussion here, but to practical people the significant fact about it is that the Holy Spirit and the Church were in accord. From this point on, to the close of his book, Luke has very little to say about the Church at Jerusalem, whose foundation and development have previously occupied his attention. It is the aggressive work which changed Christianity from a Jewish sect to a world wide religion that absorbs all his interest. It has been so in modern times. The Church occupied with its own affairs, discussing doctrinal questions and concerned about its own finances, is eclipsed by the Church intent on carrying the Gospel into the city, the outlying country, and into heathen lands. Aggressive force and missionary activity are still an excellent test of spiritual vitality. There was a farewell meeting to bid godspeed to the departing mission and Barnabas and Saul set out, with them as an assistant and John Mark, who was the cousin of Paul and the author of the second Gospel.

From Raphael's Painting.

ELYMAS THE SORCERER SMITTEN WITH BLINDNESS.

If Saul was born in the year two, generally believed, he would be at the about forty-six years old. Hence Luke calls him Paul, and seems to think that the name had been given him at birth. It may have been that his gave him both names with a definite. Saul is a Hebrew name and a Latin name. Possibly the father had had in mind that his son would be a Roman citizen as well as a Pharisee may have given him a name appropriate to each character. Although no reason is given for the change, it is reasonable to conclude that while the Hebrew name was preferred while he was in Jewish society, Paul may have foreseen that outside the borders of Judea he might have occasion to claim the privileges of a Roman citizen and a name in harmony with such a would be more useful. The name "little," and it may, as some expect, have been adopted by Paul as an expression of his humility; but as it was never a prominent trait of character, the other theory is the probable one.

The first halting place of the missionaries was at Cyprus, the Mediterranean island about eighty miles from Antioch and at that time an important center of trade, with many Jewish inhabitants about a hundred and fifty miles, and about sixty miles wide. As the place of Barnabas, it would probably have a special attraction for him, a starting-place of his missionary journey. Skirting the southern shore of the island from east to west, they reached Paphos, the seat of government. There the Roman governor was impressed. Incidents worthy of notice that as to this rank, Luke has only recently been created. The critics noted that when Luke calls him a deputy, the Roman name was used. The Roman name was said that the island was ruled by a governor appointed by the Emperor. Recent investigations however, show that at this time the Emperor had his right and the island was governed by a deputy, or proconsul, as Luke calls him. This man, however, was hindered by Elymas, one of those magicians who give information, which in those superstitious times was deemed valuable. Omens and auguries and prophecies. Such men were frequently found in the suite of Roman officials; but as Elymas doubtless realized, Sergius Paulus had little use for him if he became a Christian. Paul's withering denunciation of this man is significant in so far as it shows that Paul condemned him as a Christian. It was not as an opponent of Christianity that Paul condemned him, but as an enemy of all righteousness, which was a more disgraceful characteristic. Elymas was stricken blind at Paul's word. Luke with the precision of a physician gives the symptoms of the mist followed by darkness, which indicate the nature of the affliction. It was probably only temporary, and was doubtless regarded by Paul as a fitting punishment for a man who had tried to produce spiritual blindness in another. From Paphos the missionaries proceeded to Asia Minor—his native land. Mark, however for reason not stated, left them and home, thereby incurring Paul's long continued dislike.

They sent them away. It would not be a welcome duty for the church at Antioch to deprive itself of two such men as Paul and Barnabas. But there appeared to have been ready submission to the will of the Holy Spirit. Dr. Doherty remarks that when Andover Seminary was giving a theologian to fill one of its chairs, a delegation was sent to New Haven to make inquiries about one of the ministers there, who had been suggested for the place. The reply of one of the men viewed was: "He would be a good man for the place, but we cannot spare him. One of the delegates there upon remark that they did not desire a man who could be spared."

They preached the Word of God. It accounts for the marvelous success of their work. Missionaries, as well as preachers have found that when the Word of God is preached, souls are saved, that there is no other preaching that that effect.

Fighting on the Frontier.

RECENT news from the Turco-Greek frontier changes the centre of interest in the Eastern Question from the island of Crete to the base of Mount Olympus. As all Europe has for several weeks past, a conflict is likely to result from the close proximity of the forces of Greece and Turkey on the frontier of those two countries. The Greeks were excited, and were impatient with their king because he knew the impossibility of contending in a single-handed, with Turkey, shrank from declaring war against that power. He urged that a neutral zone should be drawn on each side of the frontier line, so that the soldiers might not be killed by the constant spectacle of each presence, but her advice was not followed. No Christian power could see engaged in war with Turkey without growing. As one of the press correspondents, who has seen both armies, the result of a conflict is not to be battle, but massacre. The Turks are proverbial for their ferocity, and they besides, the advantage of their overwhelming superiority in numbers. Their suppressed hatred of the Greek would be out with uncontrollable force, and a very slight provocation would result in a chance shot, or an impulsive movement on the part of the impulsive Greek might give the provocation, and the Turkish hordes would pour into Greece, carrying with them the sword and bloodshed to the country. Europe is in breathless suspense to see that provocation has been given. On Friday, April 10, there was fighting on the frontier, the significance of which is variously appreciated. A thousand Greeks crossed the frontier before the Turkish and attacked the Turkish guard. They are described in the dispatches as "brigands," and in the Turkish dispatches as "brigands." They are the Greek National Society, and were organized by two former officers of the Greek army. They succeeded in burning the Turkish outposts, and then they took refuge in a wood, and were surrounded by the Turkish forces, and maintained their position against all attacks. The Greek forces at Larissa could hear a firing all day, but were not allowed to the support of their countrymen. The Sultan nor the King of Greece has any desire for war. The king knows he has nothing to gain by a war, and he is shrewd enough to know that war should break out, public opinion in Europe would be against him. George, on his part, knows that his power is stronger than he, and he has warned that he must not expect help from any other power. Both monarchs, however, while preparing for eventualities, are restraining their regular troops. It is uncertain whether they will be able to do so, if this irregular conflict continues. The other European powers are also anxious to avert war. They cannot foresee whom it may involve, but once breaks out, but they know by painful experience that the wise king was right when he said:

The beginning of strife is as when one letteth out water. (Prov. 1:17.)

A Vender's Fortune.

A press dispatch from Los Angeles, California, reports the sudden accession of a peasant vender of Santa Monica to an enormous fortune. It appears that the man is an Italian, who, for several years has made a small and precarious income from a street stand. Among his customers was a Frenchman who was fond of chatting with him, and, having found out his name, would greet him politely every morning and evening as he passed his stand on his way to business. One day nearly two years ago, the Frenchman showed him a Paris newspaper he had just received, in which there was an advertisement for some one of the name the Italian bore. It stated that he was the heir to a merchant who had just died in Paris. The Italian ridiculed the idea of his being the missing heir, but at last took the Frenchman's advice and wrote to the Parisian lawyers who had charge of the case. He stated his paternity and gave all the particulars he knew about his family. In a short time he received a reply stating that if he could give documentary proof of his identity, there would be little doubt of his securing the fortune. It took the poor peanut-vender a long time to find any one who would advance the money required to get ture, no alarm was felt for its safety. The owner did not associate the settling with the disturbance in the sink. But a few nights ago, during a heavy rainstorm, the house swayed violently to the rear. The family rose hastily from their beds and hurrying on a few clothes made their escape. They were barely outside the door, when the house toppled over, with a loud crash, and rolled down the ridge, with a section of earth two hundred feet square still adhering to its foundations. The family took refuge in the house of a neighbor for the night, and the next morning went to look at the ruin. It was lying at the bottom of the sink, from which all the water had escaped. A great hole in the bed of the sink showed how it had gone, and a roaring beneath, as of rushing waters, indicated the presence of a subterranean river. It was this which had drained the sink and undermined the house. The family owed their lives to their promptitude in quitting the house as soon as they found it was doomed. Many souls would escape eternal destruction, if there were similar promptitude in seeking safety as soon as the transient character of this world is perceived:

The world passeth away and the lust thereof; but he that doeth the will of God abideth forever. (1. John 2:17.)

In Collision with an Iceberg.

The steamship Brooklyn City, which reached New York from Swansea April 8, had an adventure on the voyage which came near being a catastrophe. During the early part of the voyage there had partments and the steamer completed her voyage in safety. That she did not founder was due to the vigilance which kept the bulkheads in working order and closed them in time to prevent the water flooding the whole vessel. Similar vigilance would save many a soul from being wrecked in the voyage of life. God is always ready to help those who fall, if at the first they call upon him to save them:

When the enemy shall come in like a flood, the spirit of the Lord shall lift up a standard against him. (Isa. 59:19.)

To Secure a Lightship.

The Lighthouse Board is about to make another attempt to maintain the lightship on the South Shoal off the coast of Rhode Island. Twice since the lightship was anchored on its exposed position forty miles out in the ocean, it has broken from its moorings and drifted out until picked up and brought into port. It is not an easy matter to keep this ship in place, with the high seas and the easterly gales that wresle around the spot where she is anchored. A hundred fathoms of chain are needed, and this weight drags the vessels bow under the waves and causes it to lift the anchor from the bed of the sea. It has been suggested to the Board that a simple device might relieve the vessel of this strain. It is proposed to fix a huge buoy near the lightship in such a way as to allow the cable to play through it. It will work over powerful springs, which will effectually prevent any sudden jerks on the vessel. The weight of the cable and the dragging of the sea will thus be expended on the buoy, which will thus have to be forced under water before any strain can reach the lightship. Even then the pull will be comparatively slight, and will not affect either the cable or the ship. By this means it is believed the lightship will be kept where its warning beams will guide the vessels that navigate these waters. The world would more frequently have the benefit of the Christian's light if he would act on the same principle. As the strain of the storm will fall upon the buoy instead of the ship, so the Christian might be relieved of his cares and worries which prevent his light shining, if he would accept his Lord's help:

Casting all your care upon him: for he careth for you. (1. Peter 5:7.)

A Snake Charmer Bitten.

A New York physician was summoned on April 8 to a case that was unique in his experience. The patient was a Hindu visitor to the city. After waiting a few days he received a consignment from India of a box containing a young cobra, one of the most deadly of all snakes. He was very proud of this acquisition and prepared to try upon it the usual methods of the snake charmer, intending when it was reduced to tractability to give a public exhibition of his powers. The new snake was only three feet long and was the smallest of his collection, but it was by far the most active and vicious. The snake charmer, however, had full confidence in his powers. He took the cover off the box and began to play his weird music on the delicate pipe that the Hindoo juggler uses. At first the cobra paid no heed. It was in continual motion, and its wicked fangs were shot in and out with lightning rapidity. After a few minutes of shrill playing it appeared to yield to the charm of the music, and lay motionless with its fangs at rest. Then the snake charmer took it up as he takes up the other snakes; but instantly there was a hiss, a writhing movement of the cobra's whole length, and the fangs were imbedded in the man's arm. He shook the venomous creature off into the box, and covering it over, he shouted for help. The nearest physician was summoned and found the man employing such remedies as the snake-charmers use; but the limb was swelling rapidly, his temperature was high and his pulse irregular. The physician treated him, but speaks doubtfully of his prospects of recovery. He had too much confidence in his own powers, which is a fatal error to many souls in their dealings with the tempter:

Woe unto them that are wise in their own eyes and prudent in their own sight. (Isa. 5:21.)

LARISSA, THE HEADQUARTERS OF THE GREEK ARMY ON THE THESSALY FRONTIER.

the various documents from Italy to substantiate his claim. Eventually he succeeded and the proofs were secured and deposited in the French courts. There was a long interval of legal investigation, but it has now terminated in the Italian's favor and he has been notified that an estate valued at a million and a half of dollars has been awarded to him. Ministers and Christian workers find the same difficulty that the Frenchman experienced in getting people to seek the inheritance that is offered to them through Christ. The admonition is still needed:

Let us therefore fear lest a promise being left us of entering into his rest any of you should seem to come short of it. (Heb. 4:1.)

A House in a Sink.

A dispatch from Bartow Junction, Florida, reports a mysterious demolition of a house. It stood on a high ridge near Lake Iola. At the back of the house was one of those curious depressions common in Florida, which are called "sinks." It was about a hundred yards from the house and considerably below it. It measured a hundred and fifty yards across, and was full of water which in the middle was fully fifty feet deep. Usually the water was quite tranquil, but about three weeks ago a strange agitation was noticed on its surface, and in the silence of the night a dull, roaring noise was heard from its bed. Occasionally a vibration was felt in the house accompanied by a slight settling at the rear. As it was a substantial structure, no alarm was felt for its safety. The owner did not associate the settling with the disturbance in the sink. But a few nights ago, during a heavy rainstorm, the house swayed violently to the rear. The family rose hastily from their beds and hurrying on a few clothes made their escape. They were barely outside the door, when the house toppled over, with a loud crash, and rolled down the ridge, with a section of earth two hundred feet square still adhering to its foundations. The family took refuge in the house of a neighbor for the night, and the next morning went to look at the ruin. It was lying at the bottom of the sink, from which all the water had escaped. A great hole in the bed of the sink showed how it had gone, and a roaring beneath, as of rushing waters, indicated the presence of a subterranean river. It was this which had drained the sink and undermined the house. The family owed their lives to their promptitude in quitting the house as soon as they found it was doomed. THE FAMILY AND HOME CIRCLE.

Social Life in the Country.

Some of the Enjoyments on the Farm The Season of Outings.

IT is a mistaken impression held by many who have no experience in rural life, that the lot of one who lives in the country is necessarily a dull and monotonous one.

While it is true that there are not so many excitements in a country life as in that of the town, it is far from being without its peculiar pleasures, and these are usually of a far more wholesome and exhilarating sort than those of the city. Each recurring season brings to the farmer's household its special incident, which serves to divert the young folks and the old. The summer has its agricultural fairs and its picnics—events which agitate a whole section for weeks in advance and furnish food for gossip long afterward. To the same season belongs many other outdoor recreations—the nutting parties, the berrying, fishing, and hunting, the long rides across valley and mountain, the “barn raisings” and, later in the fall, the corn-husking with all its accompaniment of innocent merriment and hilarity. Winter brings still another round of enjoyments, both indoors and out. The skating and the merry sleigh-rides through the snow, the social gatherings indoors at Thanksgiving and Christmas, the fireside games and the thousand and one occasions at which the young folks contrive to make the long evenings pass pleasantly and happily, are all too well known to require remuneration here.

Our illustration on this page is from a photograph taken from the New York Agricultural Experiment Station, and is a typical representation of such picnics as they are found everywhere in little agricultural communities. The farmers, their wives, sons, and daughters are out for “a day of it.” Each picnicker is dressed in his or her best, and the smart wagons are loaded with hamper and baskets of good things for consumption, when sharp appetites make a halt advisable. This particular picnic took place at the Agricultural Experiment Station and was evidently well attended by progressive agriculturists, who believe in availing themselves of the discoveries of modern science as applied to the oldest calling in the world. Such reunions are an excellent means of making neighbors acquainted, as well as sowing the seed of friendship and brotherly feeling. As a class, the farmers are in cordial sympathy with the work of their experiment station, to the success of which their co-operation is essential.

More About Helping Mother.

“While reading a back number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD,” writes a subscriber, “I came across an article which, among other things, mentioned the idea of boys helping mother.” He adds:

This is a duty which I thought of in boyhood. In fact, there were no boys who lived beyond the first F. H. road and managed a farm, and I was the only one. I had no friends. My rides were long and tiresome. The work of the farm was not done by hired help. Of course we boys had to work when not in school, and father when not busy professionally, often tried his hand. This was a real pleasure to him—was indeed his recreation. Many times do I look back to those days with both pleasure and sadness. One thing is certain, there is no sorrow in the thought that I did help her, or that I learned to do such work. Sadness does come, however, at the thought of my occasional unwillingness to do for that dear saint, long since gone to rest. Oh, how gladly would I recall some of those days! Boys are so apt to think that helping mother is girls' work and beneath them. I wish it were in my power to say to all such boys, if you wish a happy old age, never shirk or avoid doing your full duty in this of all places. The memory of days when you were willing to work and tried to do everything well and to save mother all unnecessary steps—these are the days that you will remember with pleasure. They are your “jewels of memory,” much more precious than diamonds and gold.

Precious jewels, oh, how fair!
How like songs they fill the air;
Precious thoughts of home so blest,
Precious mother now at rest.

False Notions and Unhappiness.

One of the strongest and noblest instincts of the woman nature is love for the home. A well-ordered, happy home is her ideal of an earthly paradise. False educaabout a cat and it excited my curiosity so I took the piece of paper out and I enclose it just as I took it from the nest. Am sorry to say the young birds did not prosper. It may be because I took away the paper (which I never saw before). Some fell out of the nest and our turkeys killed them. We saved them several times but they were dissatisfied and would creep out again, long before they were feathered.

The verses Mrs. E. encloses, relate how a pussy cat flattered a robin until the latter foolishly left its safe nest. Then came the climax:

Then pussy cat smiled,
And robin, beguiled
By her gay and treacherous laughter,
Alighted at once
On the ground like a dunce,
And never was heard of after.

A Church Built by Dimes.

Little folks are frequently pushed aside by their elders, with the discouraging remark that they are too young to be of service in Christian work. How much better it would be if they were shown a way to do some little thing, however small, for the Master. Here is an incident from California, which may show the seniors how little hands and hearts can be utilized:

Decoto, about thirty miles by rail from San Francisco, has a neat church, built on dime contributions from youthful members of the Christian Endeavor Societies of California. The church-going people of the place are not very numerous, and they were having a hard time trying to get a church until Rev. Loyal Wirt, of

Bulgarian Village Home

N a letter from Mrs. Locke, an American now resident in Bulgaria, this interesting description is given of the domestic life of the

of that country, which is now stirred up by the prospect of war in the Balkans. The villages are small collections of houses with red-colored roofs. We stop at one (of the houses). A woman comes to welcome us, and she invites us to sit with her on the porch. She has two cushions and lays them on the floor for us. Our hostess, a pleasant woman, is very talkative, and while she speaks with various questions, we notice that she is well dressed in coarse homespun. Her fabrics are well made, they are resplendent in all the primary colors of the rainbow. She brings a dress lately made for her daughter, which is of dark, native flannel, lined with bright-colored strips of cloth down on the skirt, and is truly quite new. All such dresses in this village are in the same fashion, and you may know from what village a woman comes, by the styles of the different villages. “How do you manage to do so much work?” I ask. “We need to,” she says. “In winter we prepare our clothing in summer we go into the fields and women make most of all of the clothing in our families. We make the carpets (rugs) which we use on the floor, and the blankets which we use, and the cushions. We dig in the yards, plant corn, and the grain in the vest time, help is the corn and the grain. We chop the firewood, make petmeg (peppermint syrup), and scold the children.” “But how does your husband do?” I ask, not very much worse for him. “He is in the fields, plows, sows, sets out the grain, goes to the wood or provokes other fuel, and the care of the animals. On one side of the chimney, in the place of which the cooking is done, the bread is generally baked in public ovens or in clay ovens in the yard. Here each family has its own built outside, the floor of the room is beaten earth, which is washed with a mud-wash, and tion such as is insidiously imposed upon the minds of girls and young women by the club-house, the boarding-house, and the chit-chat indulged by victims of “high life,” may, and often do, create in the heart of women the false notion that a home is not desirable, and that the care of house and children is feminine drudgery. But such women are never truly happy. The true education and social culture of to-day develop exactly the opposite views; for, as said before, it brings out the true womanly nature in all its nobility, purity and loveliness.

Found in a Bird's Nest.

A reader of this journal, Mrs. M. M. E., of Annetta, Tex., sends this delightful little bit of bird lore:

Some time ago I noticed that a lady sent a scrap of paper taken from a bird's nest to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and it reminded me of a similar incident that occurred to me last summer. We keep pins of feeding hanging in the trees all the time for the red birds and any others that may care to partake of our hospitality; consequently they are quite gentle with us. Last summer a pair of red birds began house-keeping in a low, live oak tree. I was quite interested in their progress, and watched them constantly. One day, when the nest-building had advanced considerably, I saw a scrap of soiled paper hanging from the bottom of the nest. I got a chair, stood on it to read the paper and could read the last verse easily. It was an admonition to young birds

San Francisco, and Rev. Frederick H. Maar, pastor of the Niles Congregational church, went to their assistance. They later united in asking the Endeavorers of the State to aid in starting a dime contribution movement throughout the organization. There was a ready response, and practically enough to build the church was raised by the young folks, the children doing the great part of the work.

Example in the Home.

The dullest have noticed the inquisitive nature of the child, asking questions beyond its years and beyond the research of the present thinkers showing that a thirst for sacred knowledge is a leading trait of the tender mind. The intellectual dawn is early, and your example is molding the moral character of your child, whether you will it or not. Your five-year-old knows you better than any of your neighbors. If you sneer at sacred things, talk everything before him but something good, read everything but the Bible, break the Sabbath, and mock the Gospel by staying away from church, or if you are dishonest in trade, a high-tempered scold, a hollow-hearted, lying hypocrite, the child knows it all, and your example is the soul-poison of your own heaven offspring. Faithfully school the heart of your child in the dawn of life's morning, and your labors will be remembered by him as the years go by.

makes it smooth. It is easily swept the dirt goes into the chimney. There is not a chair or divan. At the rear of the room is a pile of folded-up rugs, blankets, pillows and clothing. You see the chest, and the bread tray in which the bread is mixed, and the copper bucket for bringing water from the village. It is astonishing with what ease the women will swing to their shoulders the long stick with a bucket of water hung on each of its notched ends.

In the ceiling above you see two hooks. From them ropes can be suspended, and a hammock speedily made case there is a crying baby that wants sleep.

Here comes in a neighbor of our hostess with her baby boy, and we exclaim once, “What beautiful eyes he has!” we do not feel like kissing him. His mother needs the application of soap and water. He wears a woolen cap ornamented with a bit of lace, a little gilt cross, a gold chain, or its imitation, charms to keep off evil spirits or sickness. The neighbor with the child gently touches my arm and says, “Will you spit at my boy? You add his eyes just now, and lest some evil come upon him, I want you to spit at him. I hesitate how to comply but it must be done, and she is satisfied. We hunt our carnage, drive off, and are soon on our way home.

officially stated that an area containing 36,000,000 persons was in the grip of famine, and that extreme scarcity existed in an area containing 44,000,000. In all, therefore, there are 80,000,000 persons — a population larger than that of the whole United States — who need help and need it in the most urgent way.

People in this country are liable to think the horrors of the famine described in this and other journals are exaggerated. It is inconceivable to citizens of this land of plenty that eighty millions of persons can be slowly starving to death. Early this year an inquiry was addressed by Mr. S. A. Kean, of Chicago, to a friend in India, Rev. C. B. Ward, of the South India M. E. Conference, whom he had known for twenty years and respected as a man of probity and truthfulness. Mr. Kean enclosed some of the statements he had read and asked if such appalling facts as were narrated could be true. Mr. Ward replied: "You ask if the facts are as bad as the descriptions. I cannot say less than that they are worse. At least one-third of India is in the grip of the famine. Not less than one hundred millions of people are in a state of helplessness that you good folks in America cannot appreciate. . . . It is an awful tale to tell. Seeing it alone is sufficient to give an idea of its horrors. . . . Parents give their children away and others sell them for trifles to get something to eat with. One of the saddest sights of the famine is the hordes of these starving children on the roads, in bazaars and elsewhere."

Another missionary writing from the central provinces says: "This famine is without parallel in the history of British rule in India. It is literally true that in this and the neighboring districts, thousands of the village laboring-class population have been dropping down dead in their homes and by the roadsides, in the jungles and in the poor-houses, because they had absolutely nothing to eat, or because the forest-roots and leaves and stalks on which they had tried to maintain life, instead of nourishing them, brought on disease and death. I think it would be difficult to exaggerate, whether by writing or painting, the simply awful condition into which some of these poor creatures, especially the children, have fallen. To say they are skeletons is only to use a term in common use in other lands for a delicate child. It one said they exactly resembled the regular glass-case skeleton with a little brown skin stretched tightly over; two eyes sunk in the sockets, and a little matted hair pasted on the top, it would be nearer the mark. The mortality is terrible, and the saddest part is that they are often in such a depressed condition when they are found that even the most careful diet does not enable them to rally and the feeble life flickers out."

Recognizing its responsibility for the

INDIA at the present moment is overshadowed by calamity so great that it has aroused the sympathy of the civilized world. Our people, as yet, know little of this tragedy, which probably efface the memory of human suffering. That they may be fully and accurately informed concerning the condition of that unfortunate country and its suffering people, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has presented in its pages a succinct history of the great famine, reviewing its origin, and the work that have produced such a painful condition of affairs; describing the sufferings of the natives as related by missionaries and other eye-witnesses; the relief begun by the Indian Government, the splendid, self-sacrificing efforts of the American missionaries, who, in the heart of the Famine, are doing a great saving work with the Fund contributed through this journal by the generous American people. The story also includes a review of the relief movement at home, showing how wondrously God has moved the hearts of this nation in sympathy for India, and how Congress has honored the work by granting ships to carry our gifts of American corn to the millions. We commend this recital to the careful perusal of every Christian's people every-

THE FAMINE'S ORIGIN.

Several causes have been named to produce the appalling situation existing in India. One of these is the proportion of the population depending solely on the tillage of the soil. In countries where there is extensive manufacture or stores of mineral wealth, or commercial enterprises, a failure of the crops would affect only certain classes and these would be able to find temporary occupation, or at least receive assistance from the classes not affected by the dearth. In India according to the estimate of Mr. Dufferin, an experienced traveler, there is an average of four natives to every five dependent on soil or belonging to the agricultural classes supported by the agricultural population, such as weavers, potters and artisans, who can find no market for their products when the demand for them ceases and his labor is in straits for another cause is the rapid increase of population amounting to ten per cent. every ten years, and with the opportunities of the agricultural classes being absorbed in industrial pursuits, there has been a subdivision of holdings, especially in certain districts, notably in Benares and upper India, there are millions of persons whose support is derived from an area averaging less than six acres. It is obvious that such persons must be perpetually on the borderland of destitution. Nor have they the resource of migration. Enormous as the area of India is, equalling nearly one-half the area of the United States, there remains but little the months of November and December. Without these rains the soil is as barren as the sand of the desert. When all is well, the land is soaked by the Summer rain and the farmer sows his millets, which he calls his kharif crop, to be reaped in the autumn. After the winter rains he sows wheat and barley, which he calls his rabi crop, to be reaped in the spring. The anxiety with which he watches for the rains is intense. If they are late or sparse, or if there is a break in them, the rainfall ceasing after a short time, the crops are ruined and the farmer sees starvation literally staring him in the face. As a matter of fact and record, there is on the averthey failed fully one month before the usual time. By September of last year scarcity began to be felt through the vast area of 381,000 square miles, having a population of eighty millions. There was a hope then that the winter rains might partially remove the pressure, but the rain was irregular, copious in a few districts, insignificant in the great majority and absolutely dry in the others. It was learned, too, that even in the districts where there had been an abundant rainfall full advantage had not been taken of it, many of the people having eaten, in their need, the corn which should have been reserved for seed. By the close of the year it was grasp of the dreaded monster. Not since 1770 has there been such a famine until now, and in that famine not less than 10,000,000 persons starved to death. The next great famine was that of 1877 when the deaths numbered nearly 6,000,000.

Failure of the Rains.

The present famine is the most extensive in a hundred years. Last year the autumn rains failed altogether over a broad belt running through the whole length of Central India, while in the adjacent districts on each side of the belt welfare of the people the Government of India has made an effort to relieve the dire suffering by commencing public works on which famine sufferers could be employed. These consist in some districts of digging of canals, the construction of railroads, or simply the breaking of stone for the repairs of the roads. A picture of one of these relief works is given in this issue. It is reproduced from a photograph taken specially for this journal by direction of Mr. B. Aitken, our own correspondent in India. It is a significant fact that although the Government pays only wages so low as to be barely adequate to sustain life, no less than three million persons are eager applicants for the work.

As our readers are aware, from letters already published missionaries in remote villages are agonized by appeals from sufferers, who are unable to reach these relief works. Especially distressing is it to listen to the plaints of converts who have been taught that Christianity is a religion of helpfulness. Yet the meagre resources of the missionaries are insufficient to feed those who come. For missionaries so situated, whose hearts are wrung by the scenes of suffering they daily witness but cannot relieve, we plead, especially for those who are denying themselves to feed the orphan children whom they have sheltered.

STARVING MILLIONS.

The following is an extract from a letter just received from one of the missionaries of the American Board, who has, since writing it, been gladdened by the receipt of $500 from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund to help him in his need:

"THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, New York:

"I have read with much satisfaction the very full accounts you are publishing from week to week of the Indian famine. I hope that you will continue to stimulate the liberality of American Christians, for the beginning has hardly come yet.

"I returned to India on January 18th, when the famine had been in progress for months, still there were only about 750,000 persons on Famine Relief. Now there are 3,000,000 receiving aid, and the numbers are increasing by a quarter of a million weekly. The cause of this sudden collapse of the people was their unwillingness to resort to poor houses or famine works until every other resource was exhausted.

"A compact statement has been published showing the percentage of the total population that is receiving assistance. The figures show that there is Famine in every District in India. The failure of crops is very general and the railways and roads have almost everywhere raised prices all over the country. From two to three per cent of the population are engaged on relief works in Burmah, and eleven per cent in one district of the Northwest Provinces. In the district of Ahmednagar the percentage on relief works is one-tenth of the whole population, or 85,000 out of 800,000 in the district, so that the distress is as keen and widespread as anywhere in the Empire.

"When people were being assured in America that 'there never was any fear of famine in Ahmednagar,' a farmer was offering his son, a year old, for sale. The price paid for him was two rupees or sixty-four cents. Only those who know the passionate fondness of Hindoos for their sons can realize what that father suffered before he could part with his child. That child was offered to Dr. Hume of our mission among others, before a purchaser was found.

Selling A Child.

Another child, some five or six years old, was brought for sale to Mrs. Bissell. Several times the father found a purchaser and a price was agreed upon, but when the money was paid over and the buyer was about to take away his 'property' the father's affection proved stronger than his necessities. When he took his farewell embrace, he relaxed his hold on the money till it rolled on the ground. Then father and son turned away weeping. But hunger is persistent, and again a purchaser was found and again affection proved the stronger. At last the father could endure the pangs of hunger no longer. The child was sold, and the money was paid; the father's grief was smothered. The final separation seemed to have been made. But now the heart-rending cries of the child at being torn from its parent moved the heart of the purchaser to return the child to its father and demand back his money. As a last resource the wretched man took the child to the 'Pinzapole,' a large enclosure where pious Hindoos feed superannuated cattle for 'merit,' and there left him to be found and cared for by whoever should find him. Other parents have locked their children up in their houses and deserted them, but in the night, lest their cries should overcome their resolution. Here they were soon found by the police, who found the houses utterly stripped of everything but those starving children. I could multiply instances, but time does not permit. I must, however, repeat that it was real need that led to such deeds. Parents love their children, especially their sons, with a passionate tenderness that will find very few parallels in America. I have no hesitation in saying that the same destitution in erosity, took active measures for sending help to the stricken multitudes. After the publication in these columns of the terribly realistic story of the famine—as related by missionaries and other eye-witnesses—contributions began to pour in in such liberal volume, that it soon became evident that our people had resolved to do all they could to save life and avert suffering in India. Our readers are already familiar with the history of the opening of relief operations in the field, with the fund they have supplied for that purpose. Up to the present time, over $60,000 have been raised through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, of which more than half has already been expended in actual relief through missionary workers at interior stations. Letters and cablegrams mentioned certain localities as among the centres of most acute suffering, and to these our first efforts were therefore directed, and, as told elsewhere in this issue, over forty missionary relief stations were soon in operation.

At this juncture what might have proved

Our corn harvest last year was 2,283 million bushels, and let us get starving India the odd 875 thousand bushels? That would fill six ships save a million lives in India. No this vast surplus now kept by us at in crib and bin, is needed for home consumption. It is as though the Father had placed at our disposal a great opportunity, in order that we reach out, with hands full of food blessing, to those less favored than ourselves. It is an opportunity that with it the gravest responsibility—den of duty laid upon the hearts of Christian men and women of America save a helpless and prostrate people their time of greatest need.

What a Sack of Corn Can Do.

If every one who can, should give a sack of corn, and no more, giving Christ's name and for his sake, we believe that the gift in the aggregate would be very far toward resting this famine, the greatest and most destructive in the present age has known.

A sack of corn. It is a very humble gift, seemingly it may mean little to the whole family in a distant village in India, where emaciated men and women and gaunt, hollow-cheeked children have counted on millet seeds as by grains for many a past, and often have not had a real meal in weeks. Men driven to desperation are selling their children for less than a sack of corn. A far will buy sacks of life-giving food. A carload of a hundred sacks will bring joy and life to a whole village.

Some have been asking us concerning this corn movement and expressing doubt as to the value of natives in India and those who are now home on furlough, assure us that it will be exceedingly acceptable. The Hindoos eat meat and live upon the products of the soil. In the villages, the natives eat grain like millet, and corn, millet, boiled leaves, mangoes, plantain and are the staple diet. Now all these failed them with the successive crop failures, and the parched soil, except in districts this year, yields no green corn from America—the land of plenty will come to these suffering ones as heavenly manna. Besides, if any proof were needed of the fact that corn is desirable, it is found in the cablegrams of Chief Justice McLean of India to the

Caring for the Famine Orphans.

"I know of at least five missionaries who have taken in 100 orphan children each. I have taken in none because I cannot. I have sixty-five Christian boys now in the high school whose parents can do nothing for them until the famine is over. These tax my resources to the utmost.

Yours faithfully, JAMES SMITH, Ahmednagar, India, March 12, 97.

AMERICA'S AID READY.

As soon as the vast extent and appalling character of the Indian famine became known in the United States, the Christian people of our land, with their usual gen-a serious obstacle to the relief work was encountered. With cereals of all kinds exceedingly scarce in India—even in those districts where a crop was raised last year—it soon became evident that to accomplish substantial and lasting results, food must be conveyed to India. Already the scant supply of corn there was held at famine prices, each yellow grain almost as precious as a grain of gold. It was clear, therefore, that the wisest policy would be to look elsewhere for a larger and cheaper supply. The moment this conclusion was reached, it was not difficult to decide which way to turn.

There is no country in the world whose crops have been so richly blessed and so abundant in the last few years as our own.

prior of this journal, in which that distinguished official declares that America's crossed gift of corn would be most welcome.

Lent Letters.

Any of the letters received in our mail at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offices urged a portion of our superabundant crop of corn be sent to the starving Indians. Here are a few that show how deeply practical the sympathy of the writers, who help to the most direct way of extending help to the sufferers:

Christian Herald, New York City: "There be something done for the starving millions of India? The granaries and corn of the great Northwest are full to overflowing, with no market for the contents. I am sure there are tens of thousands of farmers who would be glad to contribute a load of corn to help feed the starving ones. We in Russia in her dire distress; why not in America neglect this duty, it seems as though we should say to us, 'Inasmuch as ye did not do to one of the least of these, ye did it not to me.' In the love of Him, A. F."

This is from Iowa, one of the great producing States, and shows the enthusiasm that prevails among the farming communities there:

Iowa Falls, Ia.
Dr. Sir:—I am pleased to learn of what is being done for the starving in India. I am glad to hear of the corn. I live in the "corn belt." There are many thousands of bushels of corn in this section of country held at a very low price. The railroads would carry free. I shall send several car loads. Money is scarce, but corn is plentiful. May God touch the hearts of those that have it. R. C. McCLEAN.

CONGRESS GRANTS THE SHIPS.

When the proposition to send a corn-laden American relief ship to India was announced, it awoke enthusiasm in many States. First to respond was the ever-generous West. Illinois' great "corn belt" raised hundreds of tons, and her farmers were not slow to redeem the pledge. Nebraska, Colorado, Nebraska and California gave liberal pledges. Congress, after appeal, supplied a vessel which, loaded with the first famine cargo of corn, will sail from San Francisco for Calcutta.

It soon became evident that a single steamer would not suffice to carry all the corn that our generous people stood ready to send to India in her hour of need. So many urgent demands were made from all parts upon THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to take up this life-saving crusade that Dr. Louis Klopsch was finally persuaded to take steps looking to the sending of one or more corn-laden ships from Eastern ports. Accordingly, a petition was prepared and signed by him, and by all the leading representatives of the various Missionary Societies in this country, for presentation to Congress. The Memorial, which must now stand as a part of the historical record of this great relief movement, was as follows:

The Memorial to Congress.

NEW YORK, March 23, 1897.
 To the Honorable the United States House of Representatives:

WHEREAS, A large section of India with a population of nearly fifty millions has been so seriously afflicted by repeated failure of crops as to bring thousands of these inhabitants down to the verge of starvation;

WHEREAS, Millions are now in imminent danger of death while thousands are dying daily from lack of food;

WHEREAS, The famine now prevailing in India is infinitely worse than that which prevailed there in 1877, when nearly six million people starved to death;

WHEREAS, kind, sympathetic, Christian people in Colorado, Kansas, Nebraska, Indiana, Minnesota and other parts of the United States have offered to contribute corn and other bread-stuffs in large quantities toward the relief of these unfortunate people in distant India;

AND WHEREAS, The undersigned earnestly realize your honorable body to pass a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to provide transportation from New York for two cargoes of grain for the famine-stricken people of India, at a cost of not to exceed $50,000, to be paid out of unappropriated funds in the hands of said Secretary, the forwarding of the grain being guaranteed by your petitioners. Before the presentation of the Memorial, Dr. Klopsch had opened correspondence with Secretary Long of the United States Navy Department, and from that gentleman had received the warmest encouragement in the proposed plan of sending relief ships to India. It was necessary, however, that the matter should be settled through the formal channels of legislation. The Memorial found many friends in Washington in both houses of Congress. It was strongly championed by some of the foremost leaders in both the Senate and the House of Representatives, irrespective of party lines, and on the broad basis of Christian sympathy for a great people in distress. In the Senate the Memorial was presented by Honorable Eugene Hale of Maine, and, after a brief discussion in which several members expressed their warmest approval of the proposition to furnish free transportation for America's gifts of corn for suffering India, a joint resolution to that effect was adopted unanimously. The resolution was as follows:

The Official Resolution.
 WHEREAS, A famine exists in India which is daily causing thousands of deaths among the poor, which famine can readily be relieved from the products of other parts of the world, and
 WHEREAS, Generous people of the United States in different States are freely giving of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

In the House of Representatives, Hon. W. W. Grout, of Vermont, introduced the joint resolution which was received with the same generous and cordial approval as in the Senate, and passed unanimously. The money appropriated will be taken out of the unexpended balances in the Treasury, which are understood to be more than ample for such a purpose, even though half-a-dozen corn-laden vessels were sent out to India at Government expense.

A SYMPATHETIC DEBATE.

It is interesting to record the fact that these national legislators were able, in their high, responsible positions, to properly interpret the sentiment of the country toward India, and to act accordingly. Mr. Grout in explaining the joint resolution, stated that the cost of chartering a merchant vessel, should such be chosen, would be from $25,000 to $30,000, or more, and that the Secretary of the Navy had at his disposal balances of $100,000, from which the charter of the San Francisco corn ship, and of any vessel to be sent from New York could be defrayed. Representative Cannon, in speaking of the resolution, said that in his judgment the House should pass such a measure without hesitation, whether it cost $50,000 or wheat, flour and corn for relief of the famishing inhabitants in India, therefore

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to employ and place at the disposal of the Collector of the Port of New York one ship or vessel belonging to the Navy of the United States, best adapted for such service, for the purpose of transporting to the famishing poor of India such contributions as may be made for their relief, or to charter and employ under the authority of the United States a suitable American steamship or vessel with a cargo capacity of 2,000 to 4,000 tons

$70,000 to charter a vessel. He added that if the "people of a whole country, 100,000,000 or more, were starving, without anything in the country for them to eat, if this relief is to go at all, the more quickly it goes the better." Mr. Cannon then added that there were precedents for such action as it was now proposed should be taken by our Government. He referred to the relief which America sent to the starving poor in Ireland, and later the relief sent to Russia. "Now, our people throughout the United States from their abundance—it is true it is cheap—have taken large quantities of their corn, more abundant in this country, perhaps, than at any other time, and their hearts have been moved to make this contribution to go to a people suffering over a very wide area."

Mr. Grout, in further explanation, stated that the severity and extent of the famine is only poorly understood. Lord George Hamilton, Secretary of State for India, says it covers an area of 160,000 square miles, including 36,000,000 people, and that in addition to this was a region of 121,000 square miles where scarcity prevails, with a population of 44,000,000. Sir Edwin Arnold, Mr. Grout added, says that the deaths in consequence of famine (before next Fall) will be likely to be counted by the hundred thousands, and perhaps by the millions. The result of the last famine in India was that over 6,000,000 died of starvation. The area now afflicted is much larger, the population much greater, and the situation in every way much worse. It is in fact truly appalling, and such as to arouse the sympathy and aid of the entire civilized world. Not only is Great Britain through its Government, and its people through private charity, helping the sufferers, but the American people are also moving in the matter.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, he added, which sent a relief ship to Russia in 1892, has already cabled $30,000 for India's relief. Aided by the charitable people of the country, they are now loading a ship in San Francisco with grain contributed for that purpose, and they say they can load two ships more. It is a question of pure charity. "The transportation charges (for the California grain) were paid the other day by Dr. Klopsch, proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, who is receiving funds from charitable people for this purpose. Corn costs now only eight or ten cents a bushel in the West."

Mr. Barrows also spoke on the resolution, calling attention to the fact that the Indian Government and the missionaries had cabled that cargoes of corn would be exceedingly welcome. The people of our own West are eager to extend the necessary aid. Other gentlemen also spoke in the same vein, and the result, as already stated, was the passage of the resolution without a dissenting voice.

PLAN OF DISTRIBUTION.

For some time past arrangements have been in progress with a view of expediting the transportation of the gifts of corn to the seaboard. Already a number of the railroad companies have extended liberal facilities for this purpose. As soon as the cargoes are in sight, the steamships, so the Navy Department assures us, will be in readiness, and loading will begin without delay. It is hoped, if the Christian people of America respond liberally and freely, that very few weeks must elapse before the gifts of corn will be speeding across the Continent in food-laden trains, for loading on the Atlantic sea-board. Dr. Klopsch will personally proceed to India for the purpose of superintending the distribution, and will stay in that country until the last sack of corn has been forwarded to its destination in the famine districts of the interior. He goes there solely at his own expense, and all charges incidental to the journey are also voluntarily borne by him, so that the Relief Fund may not be depleted to the extent of one dollar.

As already stated, the San Francisco cargo, which is now in hand, will go to Calcutta, where the railway facilities for inland transportation are excellent. Care will be taken that none but sound, old, kiln-dried corn shall be sent, and every bushel will be inspected at the port of sailing. Our American missionaries in India of all Protestant denominations will be once more summoned to duty to aid in this distribution, and it will be welcome news, indeed, for them, when each in his respective district is made the almoner of this grand life-bringing gift from the American cornfields. Should another cargo be sent to Bombay, Dr. Klopsch will also make its distribution his personal care. It is understood that there is comparatively little danger from plague, and that with ordinary precautions, a European or American in India is safe, for a time at least. He regards the present mission as a matter of high Christian duty which cannot be delegated to another, and will perform it, at whatever risk or personal inconvenience.

OUR LOVING HELPERS.

Their names are legion. They are found in every State of the Union, in every city, in every little farming community in the land. They embrace all classes and conditions of life. Among them are pastors, teachers, business men, mechanics, tradesmen, farmers, and men and women of every calling known to industry. There are, too, among them many children. For their kind and generous response to appeals thus far made in behalf of India—a response which has made this great relief work a possibility—they are entitled to the gratitude of Christendom. But there is an even better reward—the approval of their own hearts and consciences, and the knowledge that they have done this "In His Name," for the sake of those poor afflicted ones, who would have died had it not been for their succor. But the work of helping India is only beginning.

It has had a good beginning, and thus far we are absolutely assured it has been the direct means of saving multitudes of lives and averting suffering from thousands upon thousands, who were helpless in the grasp of the famine. It now remains for us to help those sufferers for at least two months more, until the possibilities of a harvest are definitely decided. If relief can be extended from now until the end of June, the crisis may then be passed.

Missionaries Who Helped.

Rev. Dr. R. G. Hobbs, of Jacksonville, Ill., who was one of the most active workers in connection with the gathering of corn for India, among the farmers of the Illinois corn belt, will accompany the California ship to India, where he will co-operate with Dr. Klopsch in the distribution of her cargo. Assurances have already come from all the Missionary Boards in the Indian field that their workers will be ready to co-operate in all plans for distribution. Miss Mary Leitch, the well known American missionary in India, who, with her sister, Miss Margaret Leitch, has rendered invaluable aid in the present relief movement, will also visit India, where she is well known to many officials, and also to the Governors of the various provinces. She will undoubtedly be able to facilitate the work through her acquaintance with those influential persons, and thus help in bringing the distribution to a successful and satisfactory issue. All who contribute either corn or money to the India Relief Fund may therefore rest assured that every dollar and every bushel of corn will reach their final destination undiminished, and will accomplish the greatest amount of good, being placed in the hands of loving servants of the Master, who give them present labor wholly without expectation of receiving earthly reward.

Grateful acknowledgment for able and willing service rendered in behalf of the India relief movement is due to all who aided in presenting the memorial before Congress. Especially we desire to tender our acknowledgments to Hon. Henry W. Blair, Ex-United States Senator, for his very cordial co-operation; to United States Senator Eugene Hale, for his able championship in the Senate, and to Hon. W. W. Grout for his eloquent advocacy in the House of Representatives of India's claims upon our sympathy as a nation.

Nor should our friends in California, who were the first to form a relief organization, be forgotten. The India Famine Relief Committee of San Francisco consists of a number of very prominent and influential citizens, whose portraits appear in this issue. Briefly stated, the history of the movement is as follows: Members of Trinity M. E. Church in Berkeley, near San Francisco, had raised a sum of money for India; but some among them were so moved by the stories of misery and starvation coming from that unfortunate country, that it was decided to engage in a more general relief effort.

The California Committee's Work.

Accordingly, Hon. James B. Phelan, Mayor of San Francisco; Hugh Craig, Esq., Chairman of the Board of Commerce; Claus Spreckels, the sugar magnate; George McNear, one of the leading grain merchants on the Pacific coast; B. N. Lillenthal, cashier of the Anglo-California Bank; Thomas Brown, of the Bank of California; Irving M. Scott, a leading builder of battle ships and cruisers; and Joseph D. Grant, a member of a prominent business firm, were personally interested in the movement. A Committee was organized with Mr. Brown as chairman and Mr. R. D. Perry, as secretary, and voluntary contributions of grain were invited, with the result that a very large quantity was soon pledged to the Committee. Congress then granted the vessel, as has already been stated, Senator Perkins, Representative McGuire, Mr. H. De Young, Esq., and others aiding in calling the attention of the national legislature to the work. The Committee also had the active co-operation of many very worthy citizens, and a number of eminent clergymen of different denominations. Bishop Newman gave his aid and counsel. In view of the fact that the movement under THE CHRISTIAN HERALD auspices had, by this time, become general throughout the country, the California Committee thought best to act in conjunction with this journal, consenting to merge their work in the larger enterprise.

A GOLDEN OPPORTUNITY.

If you, dear reader, feel it laid upon your heart that you should have a share in this Christian work, in which so many thousands of the Lord's people are now engaged, the time to act upon that resolution is now. Help India to-day; a day's delay means the sacrifice of helpless human lives.

Put yourselves in the place of those brothers and sisters who are perishing for the lack of food, while we have a superabundance of every good thing. Picture to yourselves the anguish, the long weary days and weeks of hunger and weakness, the dumb pain that clutches the heart as we see those dear to us droop and die; the suffering of mothers who watch their children fade away day by day, till the little life flickers out; of fathers who, to save some, are even selling their own children. Shall we shut up the bowels of our compassion and tell them that we cannot spare them even the crumbs from our loaded tables; that American money and American grain are for Americans only; that religion is one thing and charity another? Or shall we open up our hearts, our purses and our granaries to them, and bid them in the name of our blessed Master, share with us the bounties of our Heavenly Father's goodness?

IS YOUR NAME ON THE LIFE-ROLL?

Everyone who has the slightest claim to the title of Christian should seize this opportunity to place his name upon the roll of life-savers. Every pastor can aid the work by putting it before his flock; every Sunday School superintendent can tell his scholars of the glorious opportunity of which they may avail themselves; for it is certainly a great thing to save even a single life. Every Sunday School teacher has here a chance to make propaganda for the Gospel of Christ and humanity among the members of his class; so also have the King's Daughters, Epworth Leagues, Christian Endeavor Societies, Ladies' Aids, Young People's Unions, and the various other church societies.

If you cannot send corn, send what will buy corn—its equivalent in money. Remember, a dollar will put three bushels of corn on board ship, furnish food for one person at least for three months, and save one precious life. Every village and every farm community, North, South, East and West, should be represented in this blessed corn gathering. Local committees should be organized. Let the farmers, store-keepers, millers, all who can, each give their quota according to their

INDIA'S PLEA.

THERE'S a cry from distant India;
'Tis a bitter cry for bread.

Hearken to it, brothers, sisters;
They are starving, dying, dead!

Now this cry of anguish reacheth
To the nations far and near;

And to every heart appealeth,
As it rings out sad and clear.

Hasten quickly to their rescue;
Hear their bitter cry for bread.

Ye, who in your homes have plenty;
Ye, whom God hath always fed.

He hath made you but the stewards,
Of the wealth you now possess;

Share it with your needy brothers,
It will help them in distress.

Hasten now, and make an effort;
Even though the gift is small.

God will see your self-denial;
He will recompense for all.

May that wail from distant India,
Bitter, agonizing cry,

In your hearts find swift an answer.
"We will help them, ere they die!"

Stayer, Ont.

A black and white photograph of a large, ornate temple complex, likely the Pashupatinath Temple in Varanasi. The temple features multiple domes and a wide staircase leading down to a body of water. Many people are gathered on the steps and in the water, suggesting a religious ceremony or festival. The architecture is traditional Indian, with intricate carvings and a prominent central dome. The scene is set in a lush, green environment with trees in the background.

For Jesus Sake.

CHRISTIAN ENTERPRISE.

Jonah's Success as a Missionary to Nineveh a Stirling Lesson for Timid and Unaggressive Christians.

It is not difficult to understand the feeling of the obscure Jewish prophet when he first realized that it was his duty to go to Nineveh and reprove the people of that magnificent but dissolute city in their way of life. He had even the slightest hope that such a mission would have the result described in the passage (Jonah 3) associated with the story. We can see from the thrilling story how he argued with himself, tried to silence his conscience. He would go and denounce their wickedness, but what his conscience told him was that the risk of it! How would a known foreigner fare in a city where he would be against him? Would he turn savagely upon him and kill him? Still the inward voice told him to go. Then he tried another way of escaping the disagreeable duty, was it necessary? God was so slow to be kind and merciful that perhaps he would come right anyway, and the people would be forgiven. But that did not satisfy his conscience. Everything seemed to urge him to go. It was uncomfortable as men are wont to evade duty. He would try another scene; he would take a journey to a place where he would not be hindered of the duty. But again he is hindered. He is held to his task and there is no escape. At last, to get peace of mind, he goes to Nineveh. But it is as a messenger of mercy that he will put his message in a coarse, unattractive form. Without any authority as we can learn, he declares that Nineveh shall be destroyed within forty days. Then he goes to a place of quietude and calmly waits to see his prediction fulfilled. To his amazement the people heed his message and turn themselves before God and sue for pardon, which is granted. Then he is angry. God has not sustained his denunciation and he feels himself rebuffed. So little of the Godlike in him that he would rather have the great city destroyed, than have his reputation as a prophet suffer. He is loath to argue with him as with a child, before he can be brought to a proper state of mind. The moral purpose of the narrative is often lost sight of by most readers. Speculations about the incident of the "great fish." As it was with the people who witnessed Christ's miracles, the wonder of the miracle fills the mind to the exclusion of the lesson, to teach that the miracle was worked. Yet the story is one worth the learning. How many Christians shrink as Jonah did in proving iniquity! All around us are sin and crime, yet who is there that goes and utters a warning? When matters break up an unholy traffic, as Dr. Parkhurst tried to do in New York, and Anthony Comstock is struggling to do, how half-hearted is the support he receives from the churches! Even with his friends and neighbors, how does the Christian speak a word for Christ! True, Jonah did his work, but in a wrong spirit; but even so, it proved effective. So might an effort made on our own day. City missionaries find how seldom their appeals are rebuffed. Many sinners within our reach have discovered that "the way of the transgressor is hard," and they need only the encouragement to bring them to repentance. We cannot tell how many of them might be won by an earnest, kindly appeal. But we do know our duty, and if we do it honestly and faithfully, the result will be left in God's hands. We are responsible for success, but we are responsible for the effort to attain it. And if we represent two business acquaintances standing together awaiting the last judgment. One who tremblingly awaits the judgment, asks the other why he is so calm, and replies with astonishment that he hopes to see Christ to escape punishment. Oh, why," he asks, in terms of bitter reproach, "did you not warn me and tell me my sin was cruel? It was cruel. I, too, might have been saved if you had spoken."

"READY TO PERISH!"

HEATHEN darkness reigns around,
Famine and death on every hand;
Thousands in wretchedness are found,
And pleading thousands before us stand.
Listen, O mortal, to their cry,
Help the suffering ere they die.

Starving must be a horrid death,
Dying by inches, hour by hour;
Parents taken and children left,
O, think of the perishing, starving poor!
Listen, O listen to their cry,
Help the suffering ere they die.

The wail of sorrow rises high—
Poor skeletons shake their fleshless bones,
Chattering and muttering till they die,
Calling for help in wailing tones.
Listen, O listen, to their cry,
Help the suffering ere they die.

O, think of what you now might spare,
To help the perishing in their need;
Your very dinner with them share,
And to their dying cry give heed.
Listen, O listen, to their cry,
Help the suffering ere they die.

Christ calls on you in this dark hour,
Your bread with starving ones to share;

Deny not, when 'tis in your power,
To give at least a scanty fare.
Listen, O listen, to their cry,
Help the suffering ere they die.

How answer in the judgment day
For lost ones you might help and save?
To strong appeals for saying nay,
And closing not the opening grave?
Listen, O listen, to their cry,
Help the suffering ere they die.

EASTER HYMN.

WHEN hate and ignorance combined
To hide my Saviour in the tomb,
No bonds that holy one confined:
He mocked the grave, forsook its gloom.

Thou, too, oh world, by sin enthralled,
No more a lifeless body lie!
God hath to farther freedom called—
Go forth to find his kingdom nigh.

And thou, my soul, entombed in night,
Too long in swathing bands hast lain.
From doubt and darkness taking flight
New heights and greater glory gain!

THE LAST TREATY.

Palestine to be given to the Jews by a Seven Years' Treaty with Antichrist near the end of the age.

BY WILLIAM MAUDE.

PEECULIAR significance attaches to the approaching dissolution of the Turkish empire, because out of it will probably come the restoration of Palestine to the Jews. In the partition of territory which must ultimately take place their claims to their own land cannot be ignored. Besides this, the treaty which will give them possession will be an epoch-making document.

It marks, in the first place, the point at which the chronology of prophecy is resumed. Since the termination of the sixty-ninth week with the "cutting off of Messiah" (Daniel 9:26) there has been no such thing, strictly speaking, as prophetic chronology, though the seventieth week may have cast back its dark shadow over the intervening centuries, and rendered a rough approximate calculation of times and seasons possible. But with the commencement of the seventieth week—the week of Antichrist's covenant—the more exact and literal chronology of prophecy will recommence, and consequently, those who witness the confirmation of a seven years' covenant between some "prince" of the revived Roman empire and the Jewish people will be in a position to estimate with the utmost nicety the precise point in the world's history which has been reached, and almost the exact order in which succeeding events are to occur.

Secondly, the making of this covenant will mark the commencement of the literal day-day fulfilment of all the visions of the book of Revelation, from the sixth to the nineteenth chapter inclusive. The first half of this last week is occupied, apparently, by the establishment of the lawless one's power over the ten confederated kingdoms and the restored Jewish people, the great work of evangelisation, symbolized by the going forth of the rider on the white horse, under the first seal, and the wars, famines and pestilences, symbolized under the second, third, and fourth seals respectively, while the latter half of the week forms the "1,260 days," or "42 months," or "time, times, and half a time," so often spoken of in Daniel and the Revelation (Daniel 7:25; 12:7; Revelation 11:2-3; 12:6-14; 13:5); in other words, the period of the "great tribulation."

Thirdly, the making of this covenant will bear witness to the solemn fact that Antichrist will be revealed. It is, of course, fully admitted that Antichrist will only drop the mask and fully declare himself, when in the midst of the week, he breaks his covenant, "causing the sacrifice and the oblation to cease," and planting his idol on the pinnacle of the Jewish temple; but nevertheless the initial stage of his revelation will be his entering into covenant with the Jews, for in that act he will be once for all identified.

When once the ten kingdoms have been manifestly established, whoever—be he prince, prelate, or potentate—shall form a covenant with the Jewish people, he and he alone is the Antichrist. Other corroborative signs—such as the mystic number 666 being found in his name—there will doubtless be, but the covenant will in itself be sufficient. Whatever uncertainty may previously have existed as to his identity will thus be at once removed. Then, if not till then, the "man" will stand forth revealed beyond the possibility of doubt.

Where do we now stand? Of the four signs of the approach or arrival of Antichrist's "own time" the first, or moral sign, viz., an all-pervading spirit of "lawlessness," already shows manifest indications that it is soon to reach its consummation in the person of the lawless one. The second and third, i. e., the revival of Cæsar's Roman empire, and its division into ten parts or kingdoms, have not indeed as yet come to pass, but it has even now reached so advanced a stage that the next great European convulsion will probably result in its complete realisation. The fourth and final sign will be the negotiation of the seven-year treaty.

THE KING'S HIGHWAY

A STORY OF THE BROADER CHRIST-LIFE

Jessie's Ambition and Nicholas Lloyd's Failure.

BY

AMELIA E. BARR.

ALICE fancied that there was a sense of pleasure or relief in the inevitable delay which her father's condition involved. If the idea of an immediate marriage occurred to him, he did not entertain it. He simply professed the greatest sympathy and disappointment, but he made no effort to take the advantage it offered, and Alice was dumbly injured by his attitude. And yet how could she complain? The man had said everything that was conventionally kind and respectful. But, oh, how little that was! For how poor are the words when deeds are possible! And how ineffectual the love that falls short of love's expectations! There was not a word uttered which could indicate the loosening of the tie between them, and yet Alice said "farewell" with a conviction that the tie was broken for ever.

So she returned to New York with her mother, and the closed house was reopened, and Dr. Anson notified of their arrival. He called on them at once, and in accord with Mrs. Lloyd's pathetic entreaties, promised to see her husband and urge upon him the absolute necessity of relinquishing affairs which he could only bring to confusion and ruin. He had frequently had a similar duty to perform, but custom had not robbed it of its sad and awful circumstance, and it was always a pitifully conscientious act. He made several little delays on the way to Mr. Lloyd's office, but the inevitable arrives, and at last he was admitted to the rich man's presence. He had a letter from Lord Medway's lawyer in his hand, and his passion over its contents was extreme. "The man professes to be doubtful about the securities I offer him," he said, and the tremor of his tongue and lips hardly permitted him to articulate.

"Mr. Lloyd," said the physician, laying his hand firmly on the millionaire's shaking form. "Mr. Lloyd, you must stop business altogether. I have come here specially to tell you to do so. Listen to me, for I am in earnest, and I am going to tell you a great truth. You are a dying man. If you had a weak, cowardly soul I would not tell you the truth, but you are no poltroon, so I say plainly to you, settle your affairs with this world. Make your will if it is yet to make, and then prepare to meet your God."

These words were spoken with the utmost solemnity, and the miserable man to whom they were addressed, listened perforce to them. Hitherto he had refused all attempts at warning, but this morning his condition made him passively silent, as the fateful words smote and smote upon his brain and entered and pierced his ears like a dart. He tried to protest—to entreat—but his tongue failed, and he buried his head in his hands and wept like a child.

When he was able to draw his scattered forces together, and to uncover his face, he found himself alone. The physician had delivered his message and left him to digest it in solitude. He went to a little closet and took out of it a mirror and looked at himself. Then he rang a bell sharply and sent the clerk who answered it for his lawyer. And whatever of misery a money-maker and a money-lover can feel in the prospect of resigning his occupation for ever, Nicholas Lloyd then felt. He looked round his familiar office as men look farewell on a scene beloved. Its solid splendor, its air of riches, its big chair, from which he had issued financial edicts, were these things no longer his? He opened his private safe and took out a canvas bag, and let the gold slip and slide through his fingers, and laughed aloud as he did so. He gathered in one swoop securities of the first value, and ungirded them backward and forward, and assured himself that he was yet then lawful owner.

He was comforting himself in this manner when the summoned lawyer arrived. "Phillips," he said with an excitement which shivered his words to pieces as they fell from his lips. "Phillips, have I not made my will? If not I am to make it this morning. Dr. Anson has just given me the order. Sit down, sir. What are you gazing at? Confound you."

"Mr. Lloyd, in heaven's name what is the matter with you?"

"I have received my—death warrant—that is all. Get to work, sir. Give me a minute or two and I will be calm and clear enough—hard lines though—hard lines." He sat perfectly still, grasping the arms of his chair, and Mr. Phillips, though very sceptical about the validity of any will made under such evident aberration of normal conditions, prepared to obey whatever the sick man desired.

"Go on, Phillips."

After a short pause the lawyer said, as he followed the transcribing pen: "I give and bequeath," then he looked into the face of his client for instructions. A very powerful expression of dissent was on it, and he raised his hand and brought it down with a frantic force as he said passionately:

"I—I can't! I won't give and bequeath what is my own—my very own—I won't give it! I won't bequeath it! It is mine. Mine only. I must keep it; yes, even in the grave, I must keep it. How can I keep it? If you are a lawyer worth your salt, Phillips, tell me that."

"Lend it, Mr. Lloyd, lend it to whoever you like. Lend it for good interest, and devise the interest for any purpose you choose. You are used to lending money; you can bear that."

"That will do! that will do! Yes, I can bear to lend it. But who to?"

"That is the question. Your daughter is provided for?"

"Yes. She has taken more than enough to that greedy foreigner—millions and millions, and a silver mine, and a southern plantation, and a Western ranch, and a vineyard in California, and other trifles—"

"What are you talking about, Mr. Lloyd? I wouldn't have such fancies, if I was you. You know better. Don't give me any Aladdin's lamp nonsense. I am here for business, you know."

"To be sure. Miss Lloyd is—is—is all right. Lend the rest of my estate to my son, Stephen. The boy is a fool, but he might as well have the spending of the dollars as the lawyers. I am sensible enough now, Phillips. I want a will made, that a lawyer cannot pick. They pick wills as other scamps pick pockets—that is about the truth of it."

"I think we had better delay the subject, sir. I doubt whether you are in a legal condition."

"Hang the condition! Lend Steve the money, eight per cent, the interest to be invested in lighting or water companies; principle to be loaned to Steve's children and grandchildren. Great Scott! What an idea! I shall own the gold, if I am dust. The land and the houses will be in my name for generations. The gold will grow beyond counting; the land will become gold. It is a great scheme! A tremendous scheme! And I can think it all out, though Anson does talk, as if my brain was—degenerate. That is the word, isn't it? Thanks to that doctor who taught us such a convenient term—it is a little more respectful than saying a man is mad, but it means the same thing, I fear."

"Mr. Lloyd, let me call a carriage, and take you home. Then I will make the will as you wish it made."

"All secure—a loan mind—nothing but a loan—and eight per cent.—Lend it to Steve—he is a fool—but a good boy—stood up for his father, and spoke out like a man at that beggarly meeting. He didn't howl with the wolves, not he! Lend the gold to my son, Stephen Lloyd and his heirs. Make all tight and secure."

"Lloyd, you know me; tight as a trivet. Come, I want to go to your house; you may as well go with me."

And thus the rich man went that morning out of his money-making den forever. The place that had known him so potent, and so worldly-wise, was to know him no more. But at the last moment, he did not think of this possibility. He called a clerk, gave him some orders, locked his desk, and with his mind full of this new idea of loaning his wealth to his descendants, shut the door of his office against himself, and went away without turning one glance backward. He never more entered the room where he had ruled so absolutely; for, as he left its threshold, he put his feet into those waste dominions of the blasted intellect, where men sit brooding on their unprofitable gold, in the hell of their own making. For greed of gold, as surely ruins the mental powers, as sensuality ruins the moral nature.

As they rode homeward, the sick man began to realize his condition. He felt as if he had suddenly been cut off from the busy, happy world around him. The physician's words returned, as if newly spoken, and his heart was sick with terror. A dismal, sullen stillness succeeded to his noisy excitement, and he entered his home, with a sultry thunderstorm in all his veins. His wife met him at the door. She opened her arms and folded him in them, and her cool, sweet presence was like a breath of heaven. For a moment he would not answer her love and pity; then the thought of his desolate condition terrified him, and he said, "Marian! Marian! I am come back to you. I am going to die. Do not send me away from you and from my home."

"I will never leave you Nicholas. I will stay at your side until the very end."

"Whatever the end may be?"

"Whatever it may be. Steve will help me. Alice will help me. You shall never be left to strangers; never!" and she put his arm through her arm and comforted him with her tender eyes and words as they went apart together.

For the worst was now known and acknowledged, and she could stay by his side, and do whatever love might do for him. He had treated her for years with that brutality which is always polite, but which makes a woman shudder, but at this hour she put all such memories away, and only remembered that she had once loved him and believed in his love, and that she had vowed to stand by him in sickness and health until death should part them.

CHAPTER X. A Great Victory.

These events were made known to Jessie through the newspapers, and they added greatly to the importance she assumed at the fashionable New Jersey watering place where she was "leading" society to her heart's ambition. So much she had obtained from Steve's love and generosity, but on the subject of Newport he had been immovable as a rock. In some way, the particulars of which she did not inquire into, he had found the necessary funds for her elaborate dressing and entertainment; he had seen her established in pretty rooms facing the noble beach, and he had then frankly told her "not to expect any visits from him." He said "he was going on a long solitary tramp, far from every one he knew, and Barely Able to Crawl Around—Now Perfectly Cured and Doing Her Own Housework.

"I was extremely nervous, barely able to crawl around, with no strength of ambition. I could not sleep, would have very bad spells with my heart, and my stomach was in a terrible condition, had dreadful neuralgia pains in my side, would be dizzy. In the midst of this I had malarial fever. I was miserable months after; could not sit up over an hour without being all exhausted. Last one of my neighbors wanted to try Hood's Sarsaparilla. I was persuaded to do so and in a little while could sleep better. This encouraged me to continue. I have now taken five bottles and am perfectly cured. I am doing housework alone." MRS. FRED T. or in September they might be as meet as they were then to part." "I vowed such words were cruel and stand she did her best in the last days they were together to draw tighter ties that Steve seemed so glad to break way from. And the man still there. It was easy yet for her to seem forget all but her beauty and dress, for the strange strong mystery hands man and wife together is not spoken. He left her finally with an aching heart, and tears in his eyes: gazed his tall figure and long swinging arms until he had passed out of her sight. She turned to the new delights of living her. She was resolved to be in all the fulness which had been dream during those years, when she had been tormented with large desires that did not go half their length. Her days were in themselves commandments which she had "the air" which was good toilet beyond itself. In her days she became the undisputed queen of the small but fashionable colony of men, filling the closet-like rooms of the hotel, and making its broad staircase flame with moving color and brilliant light. She will scold, and then find the reason to pay for them," she reflected, "I can afford to buy the summer's dress with a morning's ill temper at the end of it." So foolishly did this selfish love—a few weeks glitter and then a flattery to be paid for by the end of it, and wronging of the good heart that had been in her. The sudden departure of the Lloyds for support had to be accounted for. Soon as Mr. Lloyd's collapse was known every reporter understood the reasons to Miss Lloyd and Lord Medway. Each and all commented on their own way, and where leading were unknown, did not scruple to tell them. Jessie was equally unprincipled. "Poor Alice" with sighs and sobs, and intimated that this result was what she had always expected. She met Lord Medway at the beginning of the affair, and—well, it was better to say nothing about it. But the soft smile on her face and the irresistible suggestion any amount of friendship between Medway and herself, that she chose to imagine. And of course there were imaginations vivid enough to weave numberless pretty romances out of the unspoken materials. So the general impression was that Jessie ought to have been Lady Medway, and not have been but for her sister-in-law's financial attractions. It is personal and relative gossip, and additional influence, and she increased it by a run up to New York City to see poor Alice." This visit happened on a morning when it was particularly welcome. Mr. Lloyd had just suffered an attack of paralysis, and the house was a scene of gloomy despair that Jessie's bright and fluttering ribbons appeared mock in its atmosphere. Alice knew her, however, with the most perfect courtesy. She excused her mother as when Jessie had last heard from her. "We are very anxious for his recovery," she said sadly. "He is much better now, and we fully expected he would have been at his father's side ere this." "I don't suppose Steve has an idea of his father's serious illness. He is off the pendants, but I have not the slightest notion what mountains. After bidding good-bye, he said he did not intend to read a newspaper or write a letter, or accept a letter until he came back in September. Of course it is very disagreeable for me."

"I should think so. Are you not very anxious?"

"No. Steve can take care of himself, but it is annoying when you are in a large hotel, to know that people are wondering if you have a husband, and if so where on the earth he is?"

"Yes," answered Alice, and then there was silence, and Alice's eyes looked afar off, as if seeking her brother; and after a pause she sighed and said softly, "Poor Steve!"

"I came to ask if there is anything I can do," said Jessie. "If you would like me to look after the house affairs, or write letters, or see inquirers, you know there are a score of unusual obligations in a time of this kind."

"No, thank you. You are very thoughtful, but all such obligations are provided for."

"I am so sorry about the interruption to your marriage. It was fixed for October. Was it not?"

"There is no time fixed now. How could I think of marriage with my father dying up-stairs?"

"I did not suppose it possible. Still you must feel the disappointment."

"I am not different to other women."

"Will Lord Medway remain in America?"

"He will doubtless be governed by circumstances. We all are. Will you take lunch? I see it is ready."

"Thanks. I am hungry. Have you seen my brother John lately?"

"No. His engagement with Mr. Lloyd terminated some weeks ago."

"I am sure I don't know what is the matter with John. He hardly ever comes to see me now. He goes to see Flora. Flora has a baby girl, and"—

"Flora?"

"My sister Flora."

"Oh!"

Then there was a cool silence and a very dull lunch. Alice was naturally depressed, and Jessie was tempted to make remarks about her position which were more foolish than really unkind. "I shall have to hurry back," she said with a consequential air. "There is an entertainment to-night, and every one looks to me in some way or other. But I am sure I shall not feel equal to much dressing to-night. And yet dressing is expected of one. Still, when I think of Mr. Lloyd and you—"

"Pray do not permit our sorrows to interfere. If there are entertainments there must be toilets of course. I do wish you knew anything about my brother Steve."

"Steve is having what he calls a good time." He is awfully selfish about it, I must say. He can't bear any one to know where he is. It is peculiarly embarrassing to me."

"And to us at present. Father has asked for him several times lately. He ought to be here."

Beyond this point neither woman seemed able to get. Attempts to eat and attempts to talk all fell flat and hopeless, and Jessie finally rose, shook out her fluttering skirts impatiently and said she must go as she had a train to catch. She was not asked to repeat her visit, and she thought of that omission as she rode back to the hotel and mentally vowed that if Steve went home at this time she would go also.

"That is certain," she said decidedly. "I don't mean to be put down by Alice's cool ways. Any other girl would have talked about her marriage. She is as peculiar as Steve; a queer lot altogether." Then she remembered her own family, and felt sorry for a moment that she had not visited them. "Mother would have been so glad to see me," she thought. "I wish she lived higher up-town." St. Mark's Place is out of the world now."

A Novel Educational Competition

COMBINES PLEASURE WITH INFORMATION AND MENTAL TRAINING.

The Century Co. announces an educational competition which will arouse very general interest. Three examination papers, of fifty questions each, have been prepared; the competitors have a month to answer each set. The prizes are: $500 for the best answers, $100 for the second best, $50 for the third, two of $25 each for the fourth and fifth, and thirty of $10 each for the next thirty in order of merit; also a further and special prize of $500.

cal knowledge, these questions with practical knowledge.

Dumb-bells and bicycles may be equally useful in physical development, yet a thousand persons ride their wheels for one that uses dumb-bells. The reason is perfectly evident. Bicycle riding combines pleasure with exercise; the use of dumb-bells is drudgery. So with these questions: they combine pleasure with mental exercise. You cannot start work on the first one without continuing on to the last, and when you finish them you are repaid a hundred fold.

An analysis of the questions shows that they deal with a very large number of different points. That is, in answering fifty questions you investigate fifty subjects and touch upon hundreds of others. History and literature, the Bible and Homer, travel, machinery and law, operas and music, Shakspeare and Scott, Paris and Boston, art and architecture, earthquakes, and the heavens, cards and the stage, Napoleon and the North American Indians, the Amazon and the Mississippi, questions of home and of business—all these and a multitude of others are included. Thus, in addition to the pleasure and the mental training, comes the new knowledge that will broaden you as Greeley said it broadened Lincoln. On request, we will forward you sample questions and full particulars of the competition.

If you do not possess a set of The Century Dictionary and Cyclopedia, address us and we will send your name to one of the few clubs that are now being formed, each member of which secures a set at a reduction of over 40 per cent, and has the privilege of paying for it in small monthly payments.

New Cure for Kidney and Bladder Diseases, Rheumatism, etc.—Free to all Readers.

All readers will be glad to know that the new botanical discovery, Alkavis, has proved an assured cure for all diseases caused by uric acid in the blood, or by disordered action of the kidneys or urinary organs. It is a wonderful discovery, with a record of 1200 hospital cures in 30 days. It acts directly upon the blood and kidneys, and is a true specific, just as quinine is in malaria. Rev. W. B. Moore, D.D., of Washington, testifies in the New York Christian Witness that Alkavis completely cured him of kidney and bladder disease of many years' standing. Many ladies also testify to its curative powers in disorders peculiar to womanhood. So far the Church Kidney Cure Company, No. 418 Fourth Avenue, New York, are the only importers of this new remedy, and they are so anxious to prove its value that for the sake of introduction they will send a free treatment of Alkavis prepared by mail to every reader of The Christian Herald who is a sufferer from any form of kidney or bladder disorder, Bright's Disease, Rheumatism, Dropsy, Gravel, Pain in Back, Female Complaints, or other affliction due to improper action of the kidneys or urinary organs. We advise all sufferers to send their names and address to the company, and receive the Alkavis free. It is sent to you entirely free, to prove its wonderful curative powers.

Remodeling a Gown

becomes a pleasing occupation, provided it was stitched on a Singer Automatic. The elastic seam made by this machine is perfectly safe when locked, but can be taken apart in an instant when unlocked. Thus its use is especially desirable for the clever woman who wishes to make over a garment so that it may conform to the changing styles. Whether in the hands of the amateur or the expert, this simple bit of mechanism is the most convenient and effective of any.

Having all the advantages claimed for other "automatic" sewing machines, the Silent Singer has many points of preference that can easily be demonstrated by comparison. Of faultless construction and finish, it is absolutely the lightest-running, the simplest and most compact. It is more easily threaded, and its parts are better protected from dust. The broad treadle better promotes the health and comfort of the operator, because it is lower and the position of the feet can be changed at will. These points are worthy careful consideration by those of delicate health or unaccustomed to continuous use of a sewing machine.

SEALED ORDERS.

A VESSEL is sometimes sent in time of war, to a distant port, bearing sealed orders. The flag flies at its peak, it sails straight on through storm and calm, not knowing on what errand it is. All the day appointed shall bring revelation. As to the officers and the crew, from the brave ship carries, they are concerned only with one duty, ob-

Theirs not to make reply,
Theirs not to reason why,
Theirs but to do or die.

As they fare along the high seas, when the moment comes to put into the orders which have sent them to the desired haven. To make life, it seems to my thought, the sealed orders. For, often in our life, we are led by a way we do not see, and our own judgment is overruled. Our plans are defeated, our hopes of attainment, and our gains turn to disappointment. Bright and happy as our world is, yet a pilgrimage, and a pilgrimage at that, with fightings and fears within, so that we can rejoice that come weal, come woe, we might pitch our moving tent. A day's march nearer home. The whole of life would be a mystery, a past solving, if we were not sure of the hap-hazard, but of design, our journey, and our battle-fields are friend, whom I met the other morning. "What can you tell me of—?" I asked, comforted for the loss of her. The answer was this: "All the have tremendously strong wills. —is the strongest of them all. She understands how God dared to say the one who was as her very dear she has not forgiven him for it. So she remains desolate and poor thing." I understood. If one cannot pillow her head on her poor aching heart on the knowledge that God knows her, and God cares for her tears, God appears griefs, that her crosses and her sorrows and her bereavements are from God and benignant hand, there will

In the line of our work, too, let us not be set upon always making our own choice, since a wisdom far beyond that which is ours, is at the helm, and guides our course. Sometimes we are prevented from doing this or the other thing, which appears inviting; we afterward regret that we made a certain decision, wishing it had been reversed, or that we did not go here or there. But if we believe that we are under orders, and if we act according to our best judgment of the case, at any given moment we must not grieve or indulge in useless regrets or vain speculations as to what might have been.

We do need this caution, most of us. For, look over the last few years, and you will discover points enough. You had a chance to buy a piece of property, almost for a song, and you let the opportunity pass; another stepped in, bought the land and at once the property appreciated in value, or unsuspected wealth was developed in it, or a new railroad came that way, and the fortunate buyer was suddenly rich, while you are still plodding on.

Never mind friend, the sealed orders for you were that you were still to be poor, and there are worse things than poverty to be borne in this sphere of our earthly existence. Depend upon it, if our Lord had chosen riches for your ultimate good, the orders would have read differently. Under orders, one has not to do with consequences; only to obey commands.

We are unduly troubled and distressed at times, because of blunders we have made in determining our children's education, or in directing them to this or that end. Again the rule holds good, that if one has acted for the best, with what light he has, he must leave all with God. Nothing can go wrong for the Christian, if he lived by the law of absolute trust, for all things must work together for good, according to the Lord's promise.

BAILEY'S RUBBER COMPLEXION BRUSH

THE Face that commands respect and admiration has no false make-up. Deception has no admirers.

Bailey's Rubber Complexion Brush

simply urges the pores to duty, driving sallowness and wrinkles away and bringing health to the skin. True beauty will follow only a natural treatment. Greasy, blotched or lifeless skin will rob the finest features of their beauty. Harmful preparations only deceive the user—they cannot deceive the skin. Covering blemishes with powder is but "adding insult to injury" when the complexion is concerned.

Ten Yards of Dress Goods and Pattern to Cut It By,

Express Prepaid, for $2.00

A large mill owner having manufactured an immense quantity of Silk Stripe Zephyrs, in preparation for this season's demand, found himself with a larger stock of goods on hand than he could sell through the regular channels of trade.

I approached him with an offer for the entire lot a few days ago, and to my surprise he accepted it. It is therefore possible for me to offer a dress pattern of this elegant material, express paid, with a pattern and full directions for making, for the astonishingly low price of $2.

The patterns are those sold by several of the largest retail dry goods stores in the land. Your knowledge of patterns will show you that the standard patterns which are sold the country over would cost you for a suit anywhere from 50 cents to $1. It is therefore a very easy matter to see that at the price I offer the buyer is getting what would ordinarily cost $4 or $4.50 for $2.

This offer must be accepted within thirty days, as I must turn the entire lot of goods into cash before the 15th of May.

In order to facilitate your choice of patterns, I will be glad to send samples of goods and pictures of paper patterns for your inspection and selection for 10 cents in stamps. If you purchase from these samples, the 10 cents paid will be credited on the purchase, and you need send but $1.00 in ordering.

The fact that our advertisement is received by this publication is a guarantee that I will do as I agree to do herein, but references will be sent with samples; so act promptly and send for samples at once.

BRIEF NOTES.

Mr. D. L. Moody hopes to preach in Carnegie Music Hall, New York, next Sunday, April 25.

The Southern Baptist Convention meets in Wilmington, N. C., May 7; the Northern Baptist anniversary will be held in Pittsburg, beginning May 17.

Rev. Charles Herald had the pleasure of receiving thirty-five new members to the fellowship of Bethesda Mission, Brooklyn, at his recent communion service.

As the result of Y. M. C. A. conferences at Chefoo, Peking, Shanghai and Foochow, in China, a very general revival in Bible study has begun, and no less than seventy-six Chinese have offered to devote their lives to Christian work.

The tabulated statement of the receipts of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions for the first half of the present fiscal year shows a total of $343,517.95—a decrease of $34,283.48 as compared with the receipts of the corresponding six months of last year.

Evangelist Henry Ostrom has been holding services at Oshkosh, Wis. We learn by a letter from Rev. E. W. F. Requa of that city that there has been a remarkable movement in connection with the services. Six churches united in the work and a large number of persons made profession of faith.

At the Hanson place Baptist Church, Brooklyn, Rev. Dr. A. C. Dixon took up a collection for the Missionary Union on a recent Sunday morning amounting to $300, being about four times as much as last year. The church has adopted a young Japanese, now a senior at Rochester, as its missionary to Japan and the balance needed for his support is being raised in addition.

IDOLS, AXES AND KNIVES OF THE "STONE AGE" UNEARTHED IN OREGON.

Mr. D. L. Anderson, the Merchant Evangelist of Philadelphia, has been holding services at Lancaster Pa. and Newark, N. J. The services were largely attended and many souls are reported to have decided for Christ. Mr. Anderson is Mr. John Wanamaker's assistant in the great Bethany Sunday School of Philadelphia.

Rev. W. E. Needham has been holding meetings at Calvary Baptist Church, Sumner Avenue and Decatur Street, Brooklyn. A special feature of the meetings was Mr. Needham's talks illustrating the Gospel message. The meetings, continued two weeks, and led to the conversion of a large number of persons. Mr. Needham is now working at Coatsville, Pa.

Dr. Plunkett, Archbishop of Dublin, is dead. This loss to the church will be sincerely regretted by Evangelical Christians of all denominations the world over. His courage in consecrating Bishop Canevara in Spain won for him the respect of Evangelical Christendom and the undying antipathy of ritualists and the Romanizing clergy. He was a stalwart champion of Protestantism and a most useful Christian worker.

The new Baptist Year Book just issued shows that there are now 42,658 churches. There was an increase of 172,433 by baptism, 9,975 by letter, 12,567 by experience, and 24,885 by restoration. Against this is a decrease of 92,567 by letter, 47,726 by exclusion, 18,835 by erasure, and 31,608 by death the total increase being 269,813 and the total decrease 170,841, showing a net gain of 108,972. The total membership is 3,824,038.

The American Bible Society is sending out large consignments of volumes to Ecuador for distribution. The managers of their recent meeting in that country are very grateful for the work in Ecuador, and the Society is very glad to learn from the annual statement just issued that during the year ending March 31 the income of the Society from all sources did not equal the expenditure by nearly fifty thousand dollars. It may be hoped that the appeal which has been sent to the churches for this most valuable society will result in a large increase of funds to its treasury.

It is news from the missionaries in lands under the control of Turkey is extremely disquieting. It is feared that there will be a renewal of the persecution. In view of these reports, strong appeals have been made to President McKinley to appoint a special United States Commissioner to the Porte to urge the settlement of American claims for compensation and to insist on proper measures being taken for the protection of Americans in the Turkish dominions. Especially of American missionaries. The name of Mr. John W. Foster has been suggested to the President as that of a diplomatist especially qualified for this difficult commission. The missionary cause warmly favors his appointment, which they believe would tend to the greater security of the devoted men and women who are toiling for Christ in Turkey and its provinces. They ask ministers, churches and societies who approve the mission to write the President endorsing such action.

Relics of the "Stone Age," Unearthed in Oregon.

THE singular collection of carvings and fossil remains shown in the photograph is part of a very large number of similar articles found in excavations, caves, and elsewhere along the John Day River, the Columbian River, and the Blue Mountains, by Mr. Norman Draper of Biglow, Sherman county, Ore., by whom they were photographed for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The collection includes stone axes and knives, stone idols or gods, and many other objects the uses of some of which are unknown. The collectors had the assistance of the John Day Indians in gathering the relics.

Despite all the researches of science, comparatively little is known of the history of primitive man in America. The Stone Age is the name given to the period when stone, amber, bone, horn, and wood were used for making tools, weapons, and other implements. During that time the people knew only of the materials which were easily wrought and shaped. The mysterious cliff and cave-dwellings, the mounds, and other evidences of early occupation have shed some light on the subject, but much is left to deduction and speculation. Excavations have disclosed some hints of the mode of life of those strange peoples, and both here and in Europe the domestic implements and the weapons of the men of the Stone Age have shown the early races to be a type of barbarian unlike any we have knowledge of to-day. There was the age of the mammoth, the auroch or wild ox, the cave bear, and probably other huge animals, and human life was largely sustained by the products of the chase. Any new discovery throwing light on this remote period of man's history is of the greatest interest at the present time.

Progress in China.

At a recent meeting in the great city of Hankow, China, Dr. Griffith John the famous missionary of that city, said that the advance of Christianity in China during the year had been phenomenal. In the neighbourhood of Ku-cheng, where the murders took place, in Fu-kien, 20,000 had applied for baptism, and 5,000 of them had been, after enquiry, accepted. In the Hupeh Province, hundreds had been added to the Church, and he had never been more satisfied with any candidates than with those recently received. The work was extending into Hunan; at Heng-Chow, in that province, from twenty to thirty men had been formed into a church.

HAIR ON THE FACE, NECK, ARMS OR ANY PART OF THE PERSON QUICKLY DISSOLVED AND REMOVED WITH THE NEW & MODERNE

MODERNE

AND THE GROWTH FOREVER DESTROYED WITHOUT THE SLIGHTEST INJURY OR DISCOLORATION OF THE MOST DELICATE SKIN.

Discovered by Accident.—In Combing, an incomplete mixture was spilled on the back of the hand, and on washing afterward it was discovered the hair had completely disappeared. We purchased the new discovery and named it MODERNE, pure, free from all injurious substances, and so simple any one can use it. It is sure and you will be surprised and delighted with the results. Apply for a few days and the hair disappears as by magic. It has no resemblance whatever to any other preparation for a like purpose, and no scientific discovery ever attained such wonderful results.

NOT FAIL. If the growth be light, one application will remove it permanent. If the growth be such as the beard or hair on the nose may require two or more applications. The roots are destroyed, although all hair will be removed at each application, and all injury or unpleasant feeling when applied or ever afterward. MODERNE SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

Recommended by all who have tested its merits.—Used by people of refinement. Gentlemen who do not appreciate nature's gift of a beard, will find a precious boon which does away with shaving. It dissolves and destroys the life principle of the hair, rendering its future growth an utter impossibility, and is guaranteed to be as hard to the skin. Young persons who find an embarrassing growth of hair coming, should destroy its growth. MODERNE sent by mail in safety mailing cases, postage prepaid (on observation) on receipt of price, $1.00 per bottle. Send money by letter full address written plainly. Correspondence sacredly private. Postage stamp same as cash. (ALWAYS MENTION YOUR COUNTY AND THIS PAPER.) Cut this advertisement.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Subscriber, Chicago. 1. What amusement or recreation would you advise for a Christian laboring man? He is one of that class who is "too poor to stop, and too tired to go on." 2. Would you advise people, who are comparatively ignorant of the Bible to attempt to study it alone?

1. For week days, a membership in a Reading or Debating Club, a gymnasium or some similar institution, where mind and body will be recreated and the expense be trifling. 2. Better progress would be made and all the difficulties more easily overcome by the aid of The Helps to the Study of the Bible, which you will find bound in with all International Teachers' Bibles. The book is invaluable to students, being a whole library of theological lore in itself.

Distressed Wife. If a girl marries a minister believing him to be a sincere earnest Christian, and afterwards finds that he is an unbeliever, who is a minister only for the sake of the income and congenial occupation, ought she to leave him or to stay with him at the risk of her soul?

Why should she not devote her life to his conversion? If she loves him, as we presume she does, otherwise she would not have married him, she can have no nobler mission in life than to bring him into the fold of Christ. It will be extremely difficult, for none is so hard to win as the man who professes Christianity without having experienced its power. But the case is not hopeless. Several eminent ministers could be named who, at the beginning of their ministerial career, were not true Christians. She need not risk her soul. The earnestness of her continual prayers for her husband's conversion, the constant effort to live a life of such thorough loyalty to Christ as to be a light in the home, the attempt to make up in the Church for her husband's deficiencies by visiting the sick and encouraging young believers—all this will tend to her own growth in grace. She would have been wrong to marry such a man, had she known his real character, but being married to him, we would urge her to take up her cross, and win her husband by love and devotion as a trophy for Christ. No one else has the power that she will have with him.

Reader, Denver, Colo. Shall I be held accountable for the loss of a soul, because at the bedside of a dying friend I did not plead and pray as much as I might have done?

Remorse is useless in such a case, and you should not indulge it. You should avail yourself of opportunities that may come to you for such work in other similar cases in the future. You will not be held accountable for the loss of a soul. The person who died will have to bear his own burden whatever that may be. It is probable that your natural sympathy with the suffering, and your desire to give relief to physical pain, may have absorbed your mind as it often does with friends who wait on the sick. It is not a good time for religious teaching, though it has some advantages in the proximity of death. If you feel that you neglected your duty, you should ask God's forgiveness, and it will assuredly be given. Also show the sincerity of your sorrow by trying to win souls for Christ while your friends are well, and before they are distracted by the pain of a fatal sickness.

Mr. B. and W., Glastonbury, Conn. H. M. Stanley is erecting a bronze column over the grave of "Livingstone." Do you think a Chapel or a Home for missionaries would be a more fitting memorial for that good man?

Mr. Stanley's proposition looks to a public memorial. We believe, however, that such a memorial as you suggest would be more in accord with the simple, practical nature of the grand Christian explorer and missionary, who held true Christianity and Christ as everything.

M. H., Duluth, Minn. Do you think this competition for the Sunday School championship is a wise thing? If a scholar has never had a day's sickness, to keep him from school so many weeks, not to mention the loss of a family, whose children were not to be excused to attend Sunday School.

Our correspondent seems to misapprehend the spirit and object of the competition. There is certainly something meritorious in the conduct of a young person whose attendance at Sunday School is regular and unflinching, through all ailments, and who even makes a personal sacrifice to go there. There is no desire to depreciate the efforts of those who, through sickness or other causes, have been kept away, but there should be a standard of excellence in everything, and we submit that a scholar who loves his Bible, his Sunday School teacher, and the associations of the Lord's house, is deserving of every encouragement and recognition. Therefore, we regard the friendly contest as likely to produce an excellent effect.

E. A., Orange City, N. J. Why do you make such an earnest appeal for the starving people of India? Is it not the duty of the English Government to feed them?

The English Government recognizes its duty in the matter, and has organized a system of relief which is supporting over three million persons. Besides this, the private charity of the English people is supporting many more. But the famine extends through the whole country and now affects over a hundred million persons. Vast as is the relief given, it cannot reach even a tenth of those in need. Other help is necessary and it should be freely given in the emergency. There is special need in the case of American missionaries in India.

A CHALET AT INTERLAKEN, SWITZERLAND.

This little Swiss village has less than five thousand population and lies in a most picturesque country, among mountains, lakes and rivers. Its houses are mostly of timber and very artistic. It is a convenient centre for tourists. There are many dwellings there like that in the photograph.

Their hearts are wrung by the sight of people starving to death at their doors. The people to whom they have been preaching the Gospel, beg them to give them a little grain to keep them from perishing. Orphan children come to them begging them to care for them. But the missionaries are too poor to comply. We appeal for help specially that these devoted men and women may prove to the natives that Christianity is really the religion of love and helpfulness it professes to be. No such opportunity of advancing the kingdom of Christ has occurred in this generation as is now afforded in India, and untold good may be done if the missionaries are supplied with funds for this urgent beneficence.

Old Subscriber, Plainfield, N. J. Is it true, as some allege, that a person of illegitimate birth is excluded from the kingdom of God?

No. The passage in Deuteronomy on which such a contention is based is of very doubtful rendering. The obscurity of the word used forces us to take the spirit of the passage as our guide and even if it stands as translated it appears to relate to the public services of the Tabernacle. You may be quite sure that the offer of salvation through Christ is open to such a person and that God does not exclude any from his mercy for the sins of his parents.

A. H. W., Luton, Eng. Was it necessary for Jesus Christ to have credentials? Was not the holiness of his life sufficient proof of his divinity?

A peculiarity of Christ's teaching, which was early noticed by the Jews, was the difference between himself and other teachers, in the fact that he spoke with authority. Many of his utterances commenced, "Verily I say unto you," as of one who had the right to speak authoritatively. It was quite natural that the question should be raised, "Who gave him the right to speak so?" especially as in some instances he abrogated the commands that had been given by Moses, and had been honored from the beginning of the nation. (See Matt. 5: 27, 31, 33, 38.) The miracles were intended to serve the purpose of credentials in the same way as the miracles Moses performed in the Court of Pharaoh, in order to prove his divine commission. However good and holy a man's life might be, we should not attach great importance to what he said about matters beyond human ken. He might be right, but we would naturally ask how he should know more than other men. That is why the miracles were required to convince the people of Christ's supernatural origin.

Anxious, Brokenstraw, N. Y. 1. If a person who, under strong temptation, commits a certain sin, knowing at the time that he is doing wrong, does not afterwards feel sorrow for committing it, although he asks God to make him sorry, is not that a sign that he has sinned beyond hope of pardon? 2. If he feels himself powerless to resist the temptation and yields to it repeatedly, what would you advise him to do?

1. We do not believe it is a sign of any such thing. God will forgive the penitent sinner when he asks pardon for Christ's sake. But he must not expect God to do for him what he ought to do for himself. Sorrow will surely come to him and it may come in such a way as to break his heart. 2. He should take prompt measures to avoid the temptation. He should remove to another town, or in some way make it impossible for him to commit the sin. Even if it involve the loss of property and friends, he should bear the loss rather than encounter temptation that he finds himself unable to resist. Our Lord said it was better to lose a right hand, or a right eye, than to fall into sin. (See Matt. 5: 29.) The sacrifice

W. G., Harrisburg, Pa. Do you not your remarks on the injunctions of Paul, women taking part in public service Christ's command to wash each other impair the authority of the Bible: that every word of the Bible is the God and even the punctuation changed without incurring his displeasure?

Such a belief would involve you in the charge that the translators as well as writers were inspired and There was no punctuation in manuscripts. We believe that extreme literalism does more to harm the infidels can do to impair the authority of the Bible. It makes it ridiculous. Christ himself protested against slavish bondage to the letter, ignoring of the spirit. (See Matt. 23: 2-8 and other passages.) You are intelligent must tell you that in the of foot-washing it was the spiritual and mutual helpfulness kindly service that Christ intended and not the actual washing of feet. It was an illustration of service pertinent at the time, because common service rendered by to guests, but in our time it is not, being no longer a common thing. But the need of the spirit prompted a man to wash another is permanent. The same principle applies to Paul's injunction. It is at the time, because of the request would have brought on the among people who despised him, but in our day the man who object to a woman leading a Church Endeavor meeting, or addressing Sunday School, and would give reason that Eve fell before he would be despised by sensible as he deserved to be.

T. R. C., Fort Morgan, Colo. In what way could the third temptation described Matt. 4: 8-9, have been temptation to Christ?

We suppose that the suggestion was of some short and easy way of winning the world to himself, which seemed to Christ equivalent to an act of homage to Satan. He resolved to take the longer way of individual and willing allegiance to himself which he has pursued. It cost him suffering and death but the triumph will be more glorious.

P. S., Millard, Wis. 1. Does Revelation 21: 8 in describing the characters who will be excluded from heaven, mean that whosoever has committed one of the sins mentioned, thereby forever loses his hope of heaven? 2. If a person sins and asks God's forgiveness, is not that just as effectual as if he asked it a thousand times?

1. No, it means the persistent, habitual wrongdoers. If a person who commits one of those sins, sincerely repents and forsakes his sin and asks God's forgiveness, through Christ he will not be excluded, or forever lose his hope of heaven. 2. How would you expect a child to act after doing something very wrong and thereby grieving a loving father? He would not be perpetually asking forgiveness after it had been granted to him; but he would probably take special pains to let his father see that he was sorry and appreciated very highly the pardon he had received. He would not treat the matter lightly, incidentally ask forgiveness and pass it by as a matter of course.

AMONG THE OORFA ORPHANS.

Shattuck Tells of the Armenian Children Whom "Christian Herald" Leaders Have Helped to Rescue and Support—A Christ-like Work.

Orphan boys of Oorfa at shoemaking.

ORPHAN BOYS OF OORFA AT SHOEMAKING.

IN the interior of Asiatic Turkey lies the ancient City of Oorfa, which was the scene of the bloodiest of all the Armenian massacres. It was estimated that in the terrible days of nearly two years ago, between 8,000 Armenian Christians perished under the swords and guns of the Moslems. After the massacre the question of providing for the very many of whom were seized and taken into their own homes as slaves and proselytes, compels the faith for which many gave up their lives and to every man who had committed the crime. From time to time, the readers of this journal, who came so generously to the aid of the destitute famine sufferers, contributed sums for the furtherance of this orphan rescue work, and were forwarded by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to Miss Corinna Shattuck, American Board's missionary in the work at Oorfa. These requests were made by cable through P. L., the agent of the American Board, Constantinople, a man of great promptness and ability, and to the English Board, who had entrusted the relief funds to Great Britain. That country has in the past two years also shown the same capacity for friendship to the German, and Holland. The pleasure in the work before our eyes, most interesting from Miss Shattuck's reports regarding the progress of the work, from which it will be seen that the gifts of the CHRISTIAN HERALD readers have been the means of enlarging and establishing the work well worthy of the widest sympathy and support. Her letter is as follows:

OORFA, TURKEY, March 2, 1897.

Christian Herald.

DEAR SIR: Your valuable letter of January 20th, and our Mission Secretary, Dr. Proctor, your appeal in behalf of the work for Oorfa and vicinity, has been a long way off. I and my associates, on her arrival in October, have been working by varied forms of work, and have reported properly to any one. English friends have, for some time, been helping the orphans in our stricken city. The offerings made before the middle of May,

1895, for the support of twenty children, and later for thirteen more, for five years, by funds through Prof. and Mrs. J. Rendel Harris (of England), who came here and saw the needs. Before the last of May, Rev. J. Lepsius, D. D. (of Germany), had offered to support fifty, and signified his intention of working up a permanent institution here. Mr. Wistor of the Red Cross undertook the support of twenty. In late December, Dr. Lepsius gave us permission to take an indefinite number, and wrote of two men and two ladies, Germans, appointed and soon to start for work here in care of the children. Meanwhile we have gathered 164 children into three homes, the sixty-seven boys being in our own house. All who are old enough are in school. Six are learning the shoemaker trade, working in turn two hours per day. Other trades should be opened for our boys. Our hearts are bound up in these dear children. I see no way by which we can give them up entirely to others. We have taken twelve children from Severeck, eleven from Adiaman and are waiting five or six from Birkik. More would gladly be sent us from all these places. Those we have are all such as have lost father or supporting brother or uncle in the massacres. Others appeal to us and we have refused them admittance, though often quite as needy as those received. There are very many widows here yet desiring our help by taking one or more of their children. After describing arrangements made for renting rooms for the strangers and such as have no houses, and continuing the carpet weaving, vari-colored stocking work, and embroidery, branches of the industrial department worked up during the past year, though yet not on a self-supporting basis, she adds: We have just taken account of stock in hand, and find £350 worth. We are getting returns in all departments, but dare not extend so as to employ all who apply, and take only the most needy. I shall be most grateful if this department can be assured of maintenance. Mrs. M. Bowen, Bible House, Constantinople, is acting as our agent for sale of embroideries. The employment, for some years to come, will be required as support for our widows. It is a great blessing, occupying the mind and thus diverting it from the overwhelming grief. Accept the thanks of a most grateful people for your generous gifts and your special interest at present in our dear people.

CORINNA SHATTUCK.

Miss Shattuck has also forwarded photographs which afford some idea of the character of the work now in progress at Oorfa. It is most wisely arranged with a view to bringing in returns, and thus making every dollar do the work of two. Besides housing, feeding and teaching the orphans, all except the very young are taught some useful manual employment, and the widows are also similarly occupied. Thus the industrial and spiritual work go hand in hand, as it did at Van under the direction of Dr. Grace N. Kimball, where the gifts of our friends were the means of furnishing employment to thousands of poor families who otherwise must have perished.

Mrs. James P. Johnson, a warm friend of Miss Shattuck, in a recent letter in a missionary paper, has furnished these biographical facts: Corinna Shattuck was early left an orphan, and was brought up by her grandmother in good 1895. She was alone with native helpers, a tower of strength to her terrified associates, pupils and neighbors; sheltering refugees, dressing wounds and, when too ill to be on her feet, overseeing and directing from her bed. Now, at the close of another year, we see her still at her post, for though greatly in need of rest, she has said: "I could not leave our orphaned people." She has organized relief work and arranged educational work for the increased demands upon it. The mission schools unite with the Gregorians, having over 1,000 children and twenty teachers. Some of the widows are trained into Bible women, some visit the sick. The Sunday School numbers over one thousand, and there are large classes. One hundred and twenty-five orphans are cared for, and there is an industrial department. When a cruel Mussulman mob sought to outrage and slay the native Christians, old New England ways. She was trained in impractical housewifery, and then a school-teacher. She is and has always been an exemplary Christian. Miss Shattuck offered herself as a missionary of the American Board, and was sent to Aintab, Turkey, in 1873.

A few months after her arrival Miss Proctor, principal of the girls' school at Aintab, was forced to come home for her health, and her responsibility fell upon Miss Shattuck. Besides this care, there was the study of the language and of the new surroundings, and of the customs of the people. The next year Miss Shattuck toured about that region, riding over a thousand miles on horseback. In the fall of 1876 she went with a native helper to Oorfa, to start an advanced school for girls. She must have been a successful pioneer worker, for the next fall she went to Kessab for the same purpose. She taught her 170 girls in the Kessab school, and visited the villages of that region. Next fall she went to Adana with Miss Proctor, and another school was begun there. Meantime her health failed and she went home, called there by the death of her sister and by her own imperative need of rest. The physician found that her lungs were diseased, and ordered her to Colorado Springs. After four years, her health having improved, a physician gave her a certificate to do half work, and she went back to Turkey. She was put in charge of Marsh College, a position she held for several years.

About three years ago she again went to Oorfa, and was there when the massacres took place in the fall and winter of they took refuge with her. Her little enclosure was packed with the innocent victims of Turkish outrage and rapacity. She faced the howling mob. To every demand that she would yield, and allow them to pass, she interposed the dignity and authority of her womanhood and the sacredness of our treaty rights. Corinna Shattuck, at the door of her house in Oorfa, standing as a protection and shield for hundreds of innocent Christians, would more than repay all the toil and expenditure of the past. We can imagine her now, as she leads the prayer meeting of four hundred Gregorian women, or watches over the school, or mothers the orphans, or plans industries or needed supplies for dependent ones, rejoicing over the crowded church and Sunday School, making much of the affection of her people.

Our photographs, which have been specially procured by Miss Shattuck for this journal, present various phases of the orphan work at Oorfa at the present time. A number of the lads are learning the shoemaker's trade, and others are learning the rudiments of different occupations, while the girls are being taught sewing, cooking, embroidery, and such industrial callings as will aid them in self-support after-ward. All are being kindly cared for and educated, and their little hearts are overflowing with gratitude to "the kind Christian people over the sea" who, by their gifts have enabled the missionaries to do so much for the helpless children of Armenia. These little ones have been not only saved from lives of misery, but from becoming proselytes to the Mohammedan faith.

FRIENDSHIP UNFAILING.

A SERMON BY

Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., on the Text: Ruth 2: 3: - -

And she went, and came, and gleaned in the field after the reapers: and her hap was to light on a part of the field belonging unto Boaz, who was of the kindred of Elimelech.

THE time that Ruth and Naomi arrive at Bethlehem is harvest-time. It was the custom when a sheaf fell from a load in the harvest-field, for the reapers to refuse to gather it up: that was to be left for the poor who might happen to come along that way. If there were handfuls of grain scattered across the field after the main harvest had been reaped, instead of raking it, as farmers do now, it was, by the custom of the land, left in its place, so that the poor, coming along that way, might glean it and get their bread. But, you say, "What is the use of all these harvest-fields to Ruth and Naomi? Naomi is too old and feeble to go out and toil in the sun; and can you expect that Ruth, the young and the beautiful, should tan her cheeks and blister her hands in the harvest-field?"

Boaz owns a large farm, and he goes out to see the reapers gather in the grain. Coming there, right behind the swarthy, sun-browned reapers, he beholds a beautiful woman glean— a woman more fit to bend to a harp or sit upon a throne than to stoop among the sheaves. Ah, that was an eventful day!

It was love at first sight. Boaz forms an attachment for the womanly gleaner — an attachment full of undying interest to the Church of God in all ages; while Ruth, with an ephah, or nearly a bushel of barley, goes home to Naomi to tell her the successes and adventures of the day. That Ruth, who left her native land of Moab in darkness, and traveled through an undying affection for her mother-in-law, is in the harvest-field of Boaz, is affianced to one of the best families in Judah, and becomes in after-time the ancestress of Jesus Christ, the Lord of glory! Out of so dark a night did there ever dawn so bright a morning?

I learn, in the first place, from this subject how trouble develops character. It was bereavement, poverty, and exile that developed, illustrated, and announced to all ages the sublimity of Ruth's character. That is a very unfortunate man who has no trouble. It was sorrow that made John Bunyan the better dreamer, and Doctor Young the better poet, and O'Connell the better orator, and Bishop Hall the better preacher, and Havelock the better soldier, and Kitto the better encyclopadist, and Ruth the better daughter-in-law.

I once asked an aged man in regard to his pastor, who was a very brilliant man, "Why is it that your pastor, so very brilliant, seems to have so little heart and tenderness in his sermons?" "Well," he replied, "the reason is, our pastor has never had any trouble. When misfortune comes upon him, his style will be different." After awhile the Lord took a child out of that pastor's house; and though the preacher was just as brilliant as he was before, oh, the warmth, the tenderness of his discourses! The fact is, that trouble is a great educator. You see sometimes a musician sit down at an instrument, and his execution is cold and formal and unfeeling. The reason is that all his life he has been prospered. But let misfortune or bereavement come to that man, and he sits down at the instrument, and you discover the pathos in the first sweep of the keys.

Misfortune and trials are great educators. A young doctor comes into a sick-room where there is a dying child. Perhaps he is very rough in his prescription, and very rough in his manner, and rough in the feeling of the pulse, and rough in his answer to the mother's anxious question; but years roll on, and there has been one dead in his own house; and now he comes into the sick-room, and with tearful eye he looks at the dying child, and he says, "Oh, how this reminds me of my Charlie!" Trouble, the great educator. Sorrow—I see its touch in the grandest painting; I hear its tremor in the sweetest song; I feel its power in the mightiest argument.

Grecian mythology said that the fountain of Hippocrene was struck out by the foot of the winged horse Pegasus. I have often noticed in life that the brightest and most beautiful fountains of Christian comfort and spiritual life have been struck out by the iron-shod hoof of disaster and calamity. I see Daniel's courage best by the flash of Nebuchadnezzar's furnace. I see Paul's prowess best when I find him on the foundering ship under the glare of the lightning in the breakers of Melita. God crowns his children amid the howling of wild beasts and the chopping of blood-splashed guillotine and the crackling fires of martyrdom. It took the persecutions of Marcus Aurelius to develop Polycarp and Justin Martyr. It took all the hostilities against the Scotch Covenanters and the fury of Lord Claverhouse to develop James Renwick and Andrew Melville, and Hugh McKail, the glorious martyrs of Scotch history. It took the stormy sea, and the December blast, and the desolate New England coast, and the war-whoop of savages to show forth the prowess of the Pilgrim Fathers.

When amid the storms they sang,
And the stars heard, and the sea;
And the sounding aisles of the dim wood
Rang to the anthems of the free.

It took all our past national distresses, and it takes all our present national sorrows to lift up our nation on that high career where it will march long after the foreign aristocracies that have mocked and tyrannies that have jeered, shall be swept down under the omnipotent wrath of God, who hates despotism, and who, by the strength of his own red right arm, will make all men free. And so it is individually, and in the family, and in the Church, and in the world, that through darkness and storm and trouble men, women, churches, nations, are developed.

Again, I see in my text the beauty of unfaltering friendship. I suppose there were plenty of friends for Naomi while she was in prosperity; but of all her acquaintances, how many were willing to tudge off with her toward Judah, when she had to make that lonely journey? One—the heroine of my text. One—absolutely one. I suppose when Naomi's husband was living, and they had plenty of money, and all things went well, they had a great many callers; but I suppose that after her husband died, and her property went, and she got old and poor, she was not troubled very much with callers. All the birds that sung in the bower while the sun shone have gone to their nests, now the night has fallen.

Oh, these beautiful sun-flowers that spread out their color in the morning hour! But they are always asleep when the sun is going down! Job had plenty of friends when he was the richest man in Uz; but when his property went and the trials came, then there were none so much that pestered as Eliphaz the Temanite, and Bildad the Shuhite, and Zophar the Naamathite.

Life often seems to be a mere game, where the successful player pulls down all the other men into his own lap. Let suspicions arise about a man's character, and he becomes like a bank in a panic, and all the imputations rush on him and break down in a day that character which in due time would have had strength to defend itself. There are reputations that have been half a century in building which go down under one push, as a vast temple is consumed by the touch of a sulphurous match. A hog can uproot a century plant.

In this world, so full of heartlessness and hypocrisy, how thrilling it is to find some friend as faithful in days of adversity as in days of prosperity? David had such a friend in Hushai; the Jews had such a friend in Mordecai, who never forgot their cause; Paul had such a friend in Onesiphorus, who visited him in jail; Christ had such in the Marys, who adhered to him on the Cross; Naomi had such a one in Ruth, who cried out: "Entreat me not to leave thee, or to return from following after thee; for whither thou goest, I will go; and whither thou lodgest I will lodge; thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God; where thou diest will I die, and there will I be buried: the Lord do so to me, and more also, if aught but death part thee and me."

Again, I learn from this subject that paths which open in hardship and darkness often come out in places of joy. When Ruth started from Moab toward Jerusalem, to go along with her mother-in-law, I suppose the people said: "Oh, what a foolish creature to go away from her father's house, to go off with a poor old woman toward the land of Judah! They won't live to get across the desert. They will be drowned in the sea, or the jackals of the wilderness will destroy them." It was a very dark morning when Ruth started off with Naomi; but behold her in my text in the harvest-field of Boaz, to be affianced to one of the lords of the land, and become one of the grandmothers of Jesus Christ, the Lord of glory. And so it often is that a path which starts very darkly ends very brightly.

When you started out for heaven, oh, how dark was the hour of conviction—how Sinai thundered, and devils tormented, and the darkness thickened! All the sins of your life pounced upon you, and it was the darkest hour you ever saw when you first found out your sins. After awhile you went into the harvest-field of God's mercy; you began to glean in the fields of divine promise, and you had more sheaves than you could carry, as the voice of God addressed you, saying: "Blessed is the man whose transgressions are forgiven and whose sins are covered." A very dark starting in conviction, a very bright ending in the pardon and the hope and the triumph of the Gospel!

So, very often in our worldly business or in our spiritual career, we start off on a very dark path. We must go. The flesh may shrink back, but there is a voice within, or a voice from above, saying, "You must go;" and we have to drink the gall, and we have to carry the cross, and we have to traverse the desert and we are pounded and flailed of misrepresentation and abuse, and we have to urge our way through ten thousand obstacles that have been slain by our own right arm. We have to ford the river, we have to climb the mountain, we have to storm the castle; but, blessed be God, the day of rest and reward will come.

It was very hard for Noah to endure the scoffing of the people in his day, while he was trying to build the ark, and was every morning quizzed about his old boat that would never be of any practical use; but when the deluge came, and the tops of the mountains disappeared like the backs of sea-monsters, and the elements, lashed up in fury, clapped their hands over a drowned world, then Noah in the ark rejoiced in his own safety and in the safety of his family, and looked out on the wreck of a ruined earth.

Christ, hounded of persecutors, denied a pillow, worse maltreated than the thieves on either side of the cross, human hate smacking its lips in satisfaction after it had been draining his last drop of blood, the sheeted dead bursting from the sepulchres at his crucifixion. Tell me, O Gethsemane and Golgotha, were there ever darker times than those? Like the booming of the midnight sea against the rock, the surges of Christ's anguish beat against the gates of eternity, to be echoed back by all the thrones of heaven and all the dungeons of hell. But the day of reward comes for Christ; all the pomp and dominion of this world are to be hung on his throne, crowned heads are to bow before him on whose head are many crowns, and all the celestial worship is up at his feet, like the humming of the forest, like the rushing of the waves, like the thundering of the seas, like the heaven, rising on their thrones, like the world with their sceptres: "Hallelujah! Lord God omnipotent reigneth."

That song of love, now low and far
Ere long shall swell from star to star
That light, the breaking day which
The golden-spired Apocalypse.

Again, I learn from my subject events which seem to be most insignificant may be momentous. Can you imagine anything more unimportant coming of a poor woman from Judah? Can you imagine anything more trivial than the fact that this Ruth happened to alight—as they say—opened to alight on that field of Boaz? Yet all ages, all generations, have interest in the fact that she was to an ancestress of the Lord Jesus, and all nations and kingdoms must at that one little incident with a unspeakable and eternal satisfaction it is in your history and in mine, that you thought of no importance have been of very great moment. Casual conversation, that accidental— you did not think of it again long while; but how it changed the phases of your life!

It seemed to be of no importance that Jubal invented rude instruments, calling them harp and organ; were the introduction of all the minstrelsy; and as you hear the vibration of a stringed instrument, even the fingers have been taken away, so all music now of lute and dulcimer is only the long-continued vibration of Jubal's harp and Jubal's organ seemed to be a matter of very importance that Tubal Cain learned the uses of copper and iron; but the foundry of ancient days has its hoarse rattle of Birmingham machinery, the roar and bang of factories in Merrimack.

It seemed to be a matter of no importance that Luther found a Bible in a tattered cover; but as he opened that Bible, the brass-bound lids fell back, throwing everything, and the rustling of the leaves was the sound of the winged angel of the Reformation. It seemed to be a matter of no importance that a man, whose name has been forgotten, dropped a tract in the way of a young man by the name of Richard Baxter, picked up the tract, and read it, and it was the means of his salvation. In a tract that man wrote a book called "The Unconverted," that was the means of bringing a multitude to God; others Philip Doddridge, Philip Doddridge wrote a book called "The View of Christianity," which was the means of bringing a great multitude of Christ, among others Legh Richmond wrote a tract called "Dairyman's Daughter," which was the means of the salvation of uncounted multitudes. And that tide of history started from the fact that one woman dropped a Christian tract in the way of Richard Baxter, the tide of grace rolling on through Richard Baxter, through Philip Doddridge, through the great Wilberforce, through Legh Richmond, on, on, on, forever, forever, the insignificant events of this world after all, to be most momentous.

Again, I see in my subject an illustration of the beauty of female industry. Behold Ruth toiling in the harvest under the hot sun, or at noon taking bread with the reapers, or eating parched corn which Boaz handed out. The customs of society, of course, changed, and without the hardships of exposure to which Ruth was subjected every intelligent woman will find something to do.

I know there is a sickly sentimentality on this subject. In some families there are persons of no practical service to the household or community; and there are so many woes all around them in the world, they spend their time languishing over a new pattern, or going into tears at midnight over the loss of some lover who shot himself. They would not deign to look at Ruth.

THE GRANT MAUSOLEUM DEDICATED.

A Memorable Spectacle—Thousands from other States Swell the Multitudes from New York—The Tomb Described.

ACUSTOMED as New York is to great gatherings, it is many years since it witnessed a pageant at once so grand and impressive as that which took place at the dedication of the Mausoleum of General Grant at Riverside Park on April 27. The occasion was the formal transference of the tomb to the city of New York by the Grant Monument Association. Many States were represented, and the ceremony was in every sense a national event. In view of the general interest in the dedication, the New York State Legislature had designated April 27 as a legal holiday in the State, and the result was an attendance so vast and so remarkable in its character, that it must take a place in the pages dedication ceremony with prayer, and was followed by General Horace Porter in an oration, confiding the monument to the care of the city. Mayor Strong and President McKinley were also among the speakers, and after the benediction, a choir of 1,000 voices sang the national air, "The Star Spangled Banner." Seats had been erected for over 20,000 invited guests, one stand alone having a capacity of 10,000, and another of four thousand. All along the line of the parade were count-used in the memorial structure is of light colored, flawless, and durable granite, from quarries in Maine, the sarcophagus being of fine porphyry of a brilliant red color. Grecian doric is the style of the lower part of the main building. In a recent contribution to The Century Magazine, Gen. Horace Porter gives this interesting description of the structure: The interior is cruciform in plan, seventy-six feet at the greatest dimension, the four corners being piers of masonry connected at the top by coffered arches, the crowns of which are fifty feet from the floor-level. On these arches rests an open circular gallery of forty feet inner diameter, culminating in a paneled dome 105 feet above the level of the floor. The surfaces between the planes of the faces of the arches and the dome form pendentives which are decorated in high-relief sculpture, the work of J. Massey Rhind, and emblematic of the birth, military and civic life, and death of General Grant. The sarcophagi has been placed in a crypt directly beneath the centre of the dome. The approach to the crypt is by stairways which give access to the passage encircling the space dedicated to the sarcophagi, which space is surrounded by square columns supporting paneled marble ceilings and entablature. A circular opening in the main floor gives an unobstructed view of the sarcophagi from that floor and from the gallery. To get out the large blocks of stone, new beds had to be opened at great depths in the quarry, and the dressing, carving, and transporting of the enormous amount of granite required for the construction was a tedious process. The time from the laying of the corner-stone to the completion of the tomb has been five years, a shorter period than has been consumed in the building of any conspicuous memorial in history. The Bunker Hill Monument, which cost $150,000, was not completed until seventeen years after the corner was laid. In the case of the Washington Monument, the time consumed was thirty-seven years.

What One Sunday School Did.

Great interest in the India famine sufferers is being awakened among Sunday Schools throughout the country. As an illustration of the good that may be accomplished in this way, the Presbyterian Sunday School of Hempstead, L. I., through Miss A. M. Chapman, has sent $24 to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD India Relief Fund, the gift of the following persons:

Annie Volmer, Mary De Wint, Hannah Hank, Miss Werner, C. W. Ludlum, Mrs. G. W. Paynter, Edith Paynter, Mable Corwith, Florence Epworth, Mrs. Apollon Smith, Alice Ludlum, Eleanor Smith, Bessie H. We would again call the attention of our readers to the neat little "Famine Mite Boxes," which will be found an invaluable aid to all who are interested in aiding the movement for India relief. We will send a Mite Box to any address on receiving a request by postal card. They can be used by churches, Sunday Schools, societies or individuals with equal facility. Each box contains full instructions, and besides its utility, is interesting as a souvenir of the relief movement.

less thousands of spectators, and the windows, stoops, balconies, and roofs of houses were densely crowded, every available post of observation being occupied.

It is doubtful, whether on any previous occasion, so many visitors from other cities have been assembled in the uptown streets of New York. For days in advance the railroads have been carrying very large numbers of strangers to the metropolis, being drawn hither by a desire to join in the national tribute to the great military hero, and also to witness the splendid pageants by land and water.

In order that the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who have not yet seen the Grant monument may form an idea of the massive and imposing structure which now marks his last resting-place, we publish on the first page of this issue, and also on this page, illustrations of the monument. It was General Grant's own desire, expressed shortly before his death, that he should be buried in New York, and the selection of a site for a monumental tomb on the banks of the Hudson was made with the assent and approval of history. Invitations had been sent by the Memorial Committee to all the leading national officials and to those of the various States, to the President and ex-President, the present Cabinet and its predecessor, the members of the Grant family, the Supreme Court Justices, Diplomatic Corps, State Governors, and the distinguished military and naval chiefs of the nation, as well as to those eminent in science, art, and the professions; and the attendance showed the acceptance to have been universal.

The features of the celebration were the splendid display of national and State troops, the parade of civic bodies and societies, and a brilliant river pageant, in which a fleet of United States naval vessels, with foreign warships and a great variety of merchant vessels, took part. Among the United States troops were soldiers of all arms of the service from Vermont, Rhode Island, New York, Maryland, Virginia, and the District of Columbia, the whole over 5,000 strong. State troops to the number of 20,000 came from Massachusetts, Rhode Island, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland and Virginia, some States sending a full brigade. The G. A. R. made a splendid showing. Major-General Grenville M. Dodge was in command of the military pageant. It had been arranged that the exercises should begin at 11 A. M., but the multitude who crowded all the streets and approaches were so vast that there was some delay in starting. The right of the line embracing the State and National troops moved from Madison avenue and Twenty-fourth street, the other organizations following in the order of formation, and the whole passing in review before the President and distinguished guests at the grand stand just as the civic ceremony ended.

of the Grant family. The mausoleum was designed by Architect John H. Duncan, of New York, the cost being estimated between $500,000 and $600,000. Nearly 90,000 subscribers to the fund voluntarily contributed this sum. On April 27th, 1892, the corner-stone was laid with imposing ceremonies, President Harrison and Cabinet attending. The stone barley on her way home to her other-law, Naomi. All this fastidiousness may seem to do very well while under the shelter of their father's use, but when the sharp winter of misadventure comes, what of these butterflies? Under indulgent parentage may themselves habits of indolence; they come out into practical life and will recoil with disgust and agony. They will feel in their hearts that poet so severely satirized when as so awkward, things so impolite, ever regrettably pained from morning until night. Through that gate of indolence how even and women have marched, person earth, to a destroyed eternity! He said to Sir Horace Vere: "Of thee your brother die?" "Of having me to do," was the answer. "Ah!" "Nola," "that's enough to kill any of us." Oh! can it be possible in this world, where there is so much suffering alleviated, so much darkness lightened, and so many burdens relieved, that there is any person who would anything to do?

ne de Stael did a world of work for me, and one day, he was seated amid trunks of music, all of which he had mastered. I had manuscript books which she had written, and he said to her: "How much time to attend to these things?" "Oh," he said, "these are not things I am proud of. I can boast is in the fact that I have seventeen years of any one of which I could make a livelihood necessary." And if in the spheres there is so much to be done, in spiritual work how vast the field! Why dying all around me without one word of comfort! We want more light, more Hannahs, more Rebecca, more Marys, more Deborahs, more of body, mind, soul, the Lord who bought me. Once more I learn from my subtle value of gleaning. Ruth going to the harvest-field might have said: "Behold a straw, and there is a straw, what is a straw? I can't get any for myself or my mother-in-law of these separate straws." Not so beautiful Ruth. She gathered sheaves, and she put them together, sheaves, until she got enough to make a sheaf. Putting that down, she gathered more straws, until she had another sheaf, and another, and another, and then she brought them together, and she threshed them. She had an ephah of barley, nine bushels. Oh, that we might all be like her!

William Burritt learned many things while working in a blacksmith's shop. Abernethy, the world-renowned philosopher, a philosopher in Scotland, and he got philosophy, or the chief part of it, from a physician, he was waiting for a doctor of the sick-room to open. Yet why there are in this day who say they are so busy they have no time for spiritual improvement: the great things of life cross the field like strong reapers and carry off all the hours, and are only here and there a fragment of that is not worth gleaning. Ah, my friend, you could go into the busiest day of the busiest week of your life and find idle opportunities, which, gathered, might make a whole sheaf for the Lord's garner. It is the stray opportunities and the stray privileges which, taken all about together and beaten out, will fill you with much joy.

There are a few moments left worth gleaning. Now, Ruth to the field! Which one have a measure full and empty over! Oh, you gleaners, to the field! And if there be in your household one or a sick relative that is not strong enough to come forth and toil in the field, then let Ruth take home to feed the stray sheaf of gleaning: "He that loveth his neighbor as himself, shall doubtless come again with reward, bringing his sheaves with him." Praise the Lord God of Ruth and Naomi for a portion forever!

OUR RELIEF WORK IN INDIA.

Grateful Letters from Missionary Distributors of the Funds Contributed by Christian Herald Readers—The Corn Movement Progressing.

It is with much thankfulness we report the continuance of receipts for the relief of the famine-stricken people of India. Offers of corn also, in large numbers are coming in and are extremely welcome. We are convinced that if the Christian farmers of the West were fully acquainted with the urgent need of the people of India, these offers would be even larger than they are. Dr. Talmage, Dr. Klopsch, and Miss Margaret Leitch are now visiting important grain centres in the West to lay the facts before the people and we believe their visit will lead to such gifts of corn as will fill several ships with the life-giving grain for the starving people. The cable message from Sir Francis McLean, the chairman of the Viceroy's Famine Relief Committee, mentioned in a previous issue of this journal, proves beyond all doubt that every cargo of grain will be most heartily welcome and will save thousands of lives.

The need is very bitter. Thousands are dying daily. All through the country grain is stored which would keep them alive. Facilities are at our disposal by which it can be carried to the hungry people. Let it be given freely, so that God, who has blessed our land with abundance, may see that we do not selfishly keep the gifts of his hand for ourselves, but are ready to distribute them to those who are in need. Every one who gives will be literally "casting bread upon the waters," which will come back after many days. We rejoice to learn that all through this country the cry of the hungry is being heard, and that in the East as well as in the West, car loads of grain are being collected which will shortly be speeding to New York to fill the first steamer assigned to the fund by the Navy Department, for transport to India.

Unhappily, the most recent reports of the calamity give no encouragement to the hope that the earlier accounts were exaggerated. In fact, the later reports show that the area and the number of people affected are greater than was at first known.

Mr. Benjamin Aitken, our own correspondent in India, who is now going through the famine districts to find out the parts most urgently in need of relief, sends the following appalling report of the extent of the famine:

I may draw attention to a discrepancy which may appear in the American papers, in the total number of the population affected by the famine. Irresponsible accounts give the figure as not much less than 150 millions, whereas the official estimate is ninety millions. The former estimate is the correct one; for the government estimate does not take account of the Native States, although it recognizes the actual persons under relief; nor does it take account of Assam, in parts of which the distress from high prices is very severe.

With this statement Mr. Aitken sends us the photograph reproduced on this page, of the distribution of relief in the neighborhood of Jhansi, a large city of the Central Provinces where the famine is very severe. The poorhouse there was the largest of eighteen that Mr. Aitken visited during his tour. It was also the one in which the management was the best. The difficulty of keeping order during the distribution of food is in all cases one hard to deal with, as the poor, hungry creatures are numerous, while the natives, who are necessarily employed to distribute the grain, are extremely slow and deliberate in their movements. At Jhansi, the most intelligent of the officers here themselves employed in the distribution, and having learned by painful experience the pains of hunger, were more sympathetic in quickly giving out the food. Women were employed to give the grain to the female sufferers and were careful to see that the people under their charge received all that they were entitled to. The picture shows the men receiving one of their daily allowances of food under the supervision of the doctor. Two servants have on their heads baskets containing the flat cakes of unleavened bread, which is the common food of the natives. The cakes are the "Chuppatees" which travelers in India so frequently speak of as the ordinary diet of the people. One servant carries a pair of scales for weighing the cakes, so that there shall be no doubt of each sufferer getting his full allowance. In the background are the sheds of straw thatch in which the people are sheltered.

"In these camps," says a dispatch from Jhansi to the New York Sun, "wretched creatures clothed in rags and pitifully emaciated congregate. Many, alas! have waited too long before applying for relief and death soon claims them. Not only do the common poor suffer in this time of famine, but also those from the more respectable classes who very unwillingly make known their destitution. For many months to come we can hope for little relief. The grain soon to be harvested will yield a small return, for not only is the yield below the average, but owing to the drought only one half the average was sown."

Dr. J. E. Scott, writing to the Christian Advocate from Muttra, India, pleads for the native Christians. "Their needs are greater than those of the non-Christians. They are neglected in the daily ministrations. Belonging to the depressed classes, at such a time they are more depressed—because they are low castes, and as they are Christians, many think the missionaries should care for them. We are in a crisis. Our workers are poorly paid at any time, but now the small pay they get is not adequate. We are able to do less for ourselves. We have had to dismiss workers into starvation and death and leave many a flock without a shepherd. But our people are the most patient people in the world. They suffer, and, as a rule, make no sign. What is the duty of those who have enough and to spare? They should help—with money—to keep God's work going, to feed and clothe the starving, to alleviate the awful suffering of those poor people in this their hour of need."

first remittances of $500 was sent, writes:

It touches our hearts that American Christians are giving for famine relief and we are thankful that they send money through missionaries. The government is doing good work, but the native officials who are under the English alternate the grain with earth and in other ways abuse their trust.

Rev. James Smith, American missionary of Ahmednagar, after describing the irrigation well that had caved in fifty-one hundred years ago, and thus became a well, says: "It will irrigate about four acres of land, increase its productiveness at least fourfold."

While I was writing the above I was asked by two more persons for work, and they said they were "dying of starvation," and I quoted them. Such work as I am giving is meagre with the ignorant than the Government which takes people away from their homes and puts them in huge camps under conditions arrangements made by the Government for the relief of famine sufferers, writes:

There are many thousands who cannot avail themselves of Government relief, such as the old and feeble, the very young, delicate women and young girls. In Ahmednagar we have always had a very flourishing industry in the manufacture of cloth and copper pots. Now this trade is at a stand-still. These workers have all their lives carried on their work under cover. Now they must either starve or go to the Government works and break stone, or carry earth on their heads for embankments in the open when the sun is at its hottest, and this year it is hotter than usual. As I write, at 9 p. m., when it feels "delightfully cool," the thermometer registers 80 deg. F. For such persons to work out-of-doors in the sun is certain death. It is most distressing to have to tell people every day that you can give them nothing to do. They go away often without a murmur, though they may not have a morsel of food in their house or a cent wherewith to buy. A spirit of resignation has crept over the whole land. They quietly whisper, "It is God's will," and walk away. Escape seems impossible. Others are dying. Why should not they? It is a well-attested fact that hundreds of regulations that are utterly foreign to the of course breeds suspicion in their superstitious minds. So far, I have employed Christian men and women. There are of these in want that I can possibly am sending you to-day photographs of children found by the roadside, deserting their parents. The women who are holding the nurses employed by their funder to care

Rev. R. Winsor of Sirur Poonam writes that when he received notification of the remittance of $500 sent to him, his heart went out in thankful gratitude.

As I held it in my hand to read, it hardly at my command as through to perused it. My heart responds yes, to request "in the name of Christian America do my utmost to use this money sent to this stricken people to the best advantage. How can I portray the condition of ones who flock to us—words cannot do justice to the relief camp on the western side of our Sirur field. What a scene! Once can never be forgotten. I camp there are 5,000. The villages in this, our district, poor creatures coming most earnestly asking us saying, "What shall we do? We are grateful for it, a knees we thank God for it, full six months will this continue."

To this Mrs. Winsor on her own account:

As Mr. Winsor is writing, felt gratitude for the noble received through your ministry for this poor afflicted beg to add a word. The instrumentality of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD we are all so ready hearts are indeed filled with for what we have thus received those interested for India, hour of greatest need. We are able to answer the competition. "We told our hearts that you will keep us from we're nothing, nothing, you," with "Yes, we can be." The plague is increasing. We have now some cases of Sirur. But while away from the plague, one from the famine. These times for poor India. What is in store for this weeping land. The cry of the stricken, famine-stricken people up to our heavenly Father our dear fellow Christians, waters will but listen, it a mighty petition: "Send to O save, or we perish!"

Mrs. J. N. Forman, Garh, writing in the whole her husband, to whom $500, says:

May God richly bless those who have their means to alleviate the sufferings, millions, and may he give wisdom that may be used so as to save the most poor and hunger. Side by side with ministering to the body, we shall have important and even more difficult work their souls with the Bread of Life. May us to be faithful in this.

A woman here in the city was seen eat "I must have something—anything to awful gnawing," she said.

With the funds at our disposal we shall take in all who are needy, and as the strength, work can be provided for them, already here a boys' orphanage in its infancy it was a great source of sorrow that we open our doors wider and take in more waifs. Now, thank God, we can be aggressive, we shall not gather them in fearing we be able to care for them.

THE DISTRIBUTION OF FOOD AT THE MEN'S FAMINE RELIEF CAMP AT JHANSI.

That the plan adopted by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of sending the contributions of its readers to the missionaries for distribution was a wise one, there is abundant proof. Already letters have come from some of the ten missionaries to whom the first remittance of five thousand dollars was sent. They are profoundly grateful for the help thus rendered to them, and write joyfully of the good it will enable them to do in saving the lives of the people around them. Some have used the money in one form some in another, but all in feeding the hungry.

Rev. Robert P. Wilder, American missionary of Kolapur, to whom one of our thousands in the last famine, and many thousands in the present famine, even, have died of starvation almost within sight of the Government poorhouses. This was partly due to their belief in Fate and partly to their fear of contamination by association with people of other castes in the relief camps. Better throw away the present life than imperil their chances in the next. Government have taken special pains in this famine to assure the people that their caste scruples will be respected. Different castes have been provided for in separate camps, and the arrangements for providing food are carried out as far as practicable by their own caste fellows.

Your very kind letter was received by last mail. Your donation of $500 came to hand some two weeks ago. Please accept my very best thanks for your timely assistance. It has enabled me to employ fourteen persons already, and provide food for twice as many more. The work that I have employed them on is the clearing out of an ancient

OUR RELIEF BOAT ON THE FLOOD.

It is Now on its Way Down the Mississippi Laden with Food for the Destitute—Over 2,000 Sufferers Already Assisted.

It was lately foreshadowed in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the general government has decided to undertake a relief work along the Mississippi upon a large scale, and has generously appropriated $200,000 for that purpose. This sum will be expended largely in food, and in restoring, as far as possible, the damaged property, that sufferers may have shelter as soon as the flood subsides.

For some time past THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has had a relief boat actively engaged in the work of rescue and aid, and through this means much good has been accomplished. As soon as the serious nature of the floods became apparent, and knowing that very great suffering must result, the proprietor of this journal despatched a representative, Mr. George A. Seaman, to Memphis, where the steam tug Welcome was chartered and loaded with six tons of provisions, and the relief trip begun. Mr. Seaman was assisted in his Good Samaritan work by Mr. W. W. Rife, a missionary of the American Sunday School Union, who had been specially detailed for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD expedition, and had left his post and travelled several hundred miles across a flooded and dangerous section to join the Welcome. Mr. and Mrs. T. J. Strowbridge, of the Rescue Mission in Memphis, volunteered to aid during a part of the trip, and were added to the Welcome's staff. Mr. Seaman writes as follows:

ON BOARD THE CHRISTIAN HERALD RELIEF BOAT "WELCOME."

I left Memphis with a good cargo of supply of provisions and they took it back. Seventy people on Cow's Island have not eaten anything but meal, and very little of that in over two days.

In response to our whistle at this point, a man came out to meet us in a rude boat dug out of a solid log of cypress. He came from Scanlan's Landing, Ark., modestly asking for potatoes which, of course, he got and more, too. At Scanlan's Landing the people are huddled together on a narrow strip of land which can only be reached in small boats.

From the man in the "dug-out" we learned of a family of ten women and children, negroes, living on a raft about a half a mile up in the woods. This place is called Fritz's Landing, Ark. We tried to reach them in the Welcome, but abandoned it and put out in a small boat. After a hard pull through the trees and around floating debris, we reached them. They had nothing to eat except a little meal. We asked them if there was no men in the family. They told us the men were out in a boat looking for something to eat. Lett them a good supply and pulled away with their "God bless you's" following us. Mr. Rife left them a Bible. At Blue's Point, Ark., is a large raft used as a dock for distribution of local re-boat for food for fifteen sick men, women and children, who are imprisoned in New Hope Church, waiting for the water to recede. We gave him a supply for his patients. Between Memphis and White River over 2,000 flood sufferers were given sufficient food to last until government relief arrives.

G. A. SEAMAN.

Regarding the expedition, the Memphis Commercial Appeal says:

NEGROES IN TEMPORARY SHELTER WAITING FOR RELIEF, HELENA.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of New York, sends a relief boat down the river from Memphis. George A. Seaman, a representative of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, has come to this city from New York in order to accompany this expedition. Yesterday Mr. Seaman chartered the tug Welcome. Mr. Seaman will distribute the supplies to the overflooded people in need of them. This relief expedition is entirely independent of the local relief committee. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD expects to give aid to many people before they are reached by the government agents.

There are many colored sufferers along the river. An appeal has been made in their behalf by Bishop Derrick of the African M. E. Church, and already a considerable quantity of clothing and supplies have been forwarded to them by the American Missionary Society, but much more will be needed. Any one of our readers desiring to aid these sufferers by gifts of clothing or supplies can address the following reliable persons who are authorized to receive and distribute aid at the towns mentioned:

Greenville, Miss., Rev. E. W. Lampton, John Ester, Jackson, Miss., 702 Pearl Street, J. R. Risher, Rev. M. B. Meves; Vicksburg, Miss., Rev. R. Dangerfield, R. J. Russell; Pine Bluff, Ark., Rev. I. J. Low, H. H. King; Helena, Ark., Rev. I. J. Spearman; Natchez, Miss., Dr. O. P. Ross.

Home and Foreign Charities.

From "The Fruitman's Guide."

The Governor of Kansas when appealed to for his influence in securing some of the surplus grain of that section of the United States for the starving sufferers in India, loftily voiced himself as in favor of relieving home charities first. When Kansas was suffering by failure of its crops, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD distributed thousands of dollars amongst the sufferers. Now that the West is in need of assistance, through floods along the Mississippi, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has commenced distributing money, food, clothing, and the necessities of life among the victims of disaster. Before the floods became as serious as they are now, the same paper had inaugurated a movement for the relief of the famine sufferers in India, and remembering when Kansas had been in need and had received assistance, it made an appeal, believing Kansas would be glad to reciprocate from its present wealth of grain.

No money was asked for, but simply some of the surplus grain, the government having voted the vessels to transport it. England is doing its best, and thousands of pounds are being sent, but when eighty millions are suffering from famine, it is a vast army to supply, and we have the grain resources to make the famine relief work possible. Most of the States have responded cheerfully, actively and generously to this appeal, and the work is going forward rapidly. The middle of next month will see life for thousands of souls going forward to India, and those who are charitably inclined cannot act too quickly in this monster movement, which not only means humanity, but means as well the counting of a friendly feeling between the United States and the mother country, and the furthering of that arbitration which shall put an end to bloodshed between man and man.

Here we found about a hundred men who had heard from Memphis of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Boat Welcome, and had come in small boats from every direction. Mr. Rife, the American Sunday School Union Missionary, spoke to them earnestly and they were evidently touched. After a brief prayer, Mr. Rife gave Bibles to a number who wanted them. A CENTENNIAL MEMORIAL.

THE centenary of the birth of Emperor William I of Germany was not allowed to pass without appropriate celebration. On this page is a picture of the magnificent memorial raised in his honor in Berlin, which was unveiled by his son, the present Emperor, on the Emperor's birthday. The monument cost nearly a million dollars, and is a semi-circular double colonnade with a radius of forty-four yards, resting on the water. Each extremity of the colonnade is surmounted by a bronze equestrian statue with figures representing Prussia and South Germany. Within the colonnade rises an equestrian statue of the Emperor. It is of bronze standing on a pedestal of granite. The Emperor is represented in full uniform with his great coat thrown back over his shoulders. In one hand he holds a marshal's baton. The horse is represented as walking, led by a beautiful figure representing peace. One of her hands is on the bridle and the other holds a sword. The sides of the pedestal are ornamented with figures which are life-size. On the front of the pedestal is the inscription: "With the sword and the plow, the German Emperor, King of Prussia, 1861-1888. On the right side of the pedestal are the words: 'With the sword and the plow, the German Emperor, King of Prussia, 1861-1888. On the left side of the pedestal are the words: 'With the sword and the plow, the German Emperor, King of Prussia, 1861-1888.'" was left an orphan in straitened circumstances. She had begun the study of vocal music as a profession, but her father's death left her without the means of completing her education. She tried various ways of earning the necessary amount, but did not succeed. Just as her hopes were failing, she heard that a widow of great wealth in Texas was seeking some woman who would be willing to sacrifice a finger to replace one that she had lost in an accident. The information reached her through the cautiously worded advertisement of a practitioner in New York, and to him she applied. He examined her hand, made careful measurements of the third finger and found that it was exactly the size of the one that had been amputated from the hand of the Texas widow. The girl's courage failed when she learned that she would have to lose the finger up to the first joint, but her desire to obtain the funds for her education finally overcame her timidity and on the amount required being promised her, she consented to submit to the operation. It has since been found that there is a law on the statute books of the State forbidding such a mutilation, but as the girl is eager to get the money and the widow is anxious to secure the finger, severe beatings as the best remedy, and whenever the fits came on the stepfather had applied a lithe switch until she was subdued. The hospital doctors had no doubt about the severity of the whippings as the girl's body gave mute testimony to the fact. They say that, in the hospital, the girl has proved tractable, and is apparently grateful for any act of kindness shown to her. It is singular that a doctor who could believe in demoniacal possession, could believe also in the efficacy of corporal punishment. He, of all men, ought logically to have urged an appeal to the power of Christ. His error, however, is a common one. Perverse children and habitual criminals are often made worse by corporal punishment, who might be saved if they were led to Christ for redemption.

For this purpose was the Son of God manifested that he might destroy the works of the devil. (1. John 3: 8.)

A Rescuer's Penalty.

A remarkable decision has been given by the Appellate Court of New York in a suit arising out of the death of a workman. It appears that the workman was adjusting the belting in the machinery of a manufacturing company. While he was at work he saw another employee caught by the belt and carried toward the shaft, where, as he very well knew, the man would be crushed to death. There was just the possibility, in the position in which he stood, of reaching the imperilled man and disentangling him from the belt. He took it promptly, and saved him; but as he drew him out, his own clothing was caught by the belt and he was carried toward the shaft. There was no one who and there were rumors of one or more children, the offspring of an early marriage in Germany being entitled to share in the deceased citizen's riches. Several suits were brought by various claimants and in the face of conflicting evidence there was a prospect of the litigation being continued interminably. But a short time ago an order was obtained from the courts to open the grave in which the dead man was buried and take from his coffin the family Bible, which, at his request, had been buried with him. It was believed that the genealogical record entered in it would settle a dispute as to the exact date of birth of his children which was one of the questions involved in the lawsuits. When the Bible was taken out of the grave, the litigants found in it, not only the genealogical record, but the missing will, which had been so long sought. As the will settled the share each of the claimants was to receive, the lawsuits were discontinued and the property will be divided according to its directions. A great deal of money would have been saved and much ill-feeling would have been avoided, if the Bible had been examined earlier. It will be well if the family continue their search of the sacred book. They have already found in it more than they expected to find; if they will turn to the text they may learn how to obtain an inheritance infinitely more desirable than the one they obtain by the document inserted between its leaves.

Search the Scriptures: for in them ye think ye have eternal life. (John 5: 39.)

Longest Tunnel in the World.

Two gangs of workmen are now at work in Colorado constructing a longer tunnel than at present exists in any country in the world. It is to run under Pike's Peak and the mountain near it. One gigantic bore is started near the old town of Colorado City and will run in a south-westerly direction to Four Mile Creek, near Sunol, on the other side of the mountain. This will be twenty miles long. It will pass directly under the cone of Pike's Peak, which towers nearly seven thousand feet above it. Lateral tunnels, aggregating thirty miles in length, ther Franco-German war. The grand procession which the Emperor reviewed was a picturesque combination of costumes, the great day alternating with the representatives of the army corps of the present with citizens in ordinary attire. The procession as it passed the monument laid a wreath of laurels on the pedestal. The Emperor's speech proclaimed for his grandfather's memory still living influence "in the cause of peace, progress, and brotherhood in the world." Whether history will indorse the title of "Great," which is officially bestowed on his monument, remains to be seen. His own modesty, which was a conspicuous feature of his character, contradicted the triumphs of his reign to the mind and loyalty of the men who supported him. He had, besides, an unfaltering faith in the over-ruling providence of God, which doubtless contributed to his highest estimate of his own achievement. He firmly held, too, the exalted belief of the divine rights of his house, and his grandson insists upon, and which to the citizens of a republic seem absurd. It is always that kings who hold the scepter also realize the responsibility to God which it logically entails. They are not to rely on the strength of their armies and forget the wise king's maxim:

The throne is established by righteousness. (Prov. 15: 12.)

To Slain a Finger.

A singular errand has brought a young lady New York from Binghamton, N. Y. She states that some time ago, she some way will probably be found to overcome the obstacle. The young lady must want a musical education very badly, to be willing to purchase it at the cost of mutilation. Men are not so much in earnest in seeking spiritual attainment, otherwise they would be ready to make the sacrifices by which alone in some cases it may be achieved.

Wherefore if thy hand or thy foot causeth thee to stumble cut it off and cast it from thee: it is good for thee to enter into life maimed or halt rather than having two hands or two feet be cast into the eternal fire. (Matt 18: 8 K. V.)

Pronounced a Demoniac.

A press dispatch from Indianapolis reports the reception in a hospital of that city of a nineteen-year-old girl afflicted with a mysterious malady. She was almost insane, but the hospital doctors were in doubt whether her aberration was due to her disease, or to the treatment to which she had been subjected. Her body was covered with bruises and she seemed to be in abject terror when any stranger approached her. When her mother was questioned about the state of her daughter's body, she was reticent, but finally admitted that the bruises had been caused by severe beatings, administered by the girl's stepfather. She said that the girl was subject to fits of uncontrollable rage in which she broke windows and furniture, and committed extraordinary offenses. A country physician had been consulted who had declared that the girl was possessed by a devil. Another doctor had confirmed the diagnosis, but thought it was twenty-one devils who had acquired possession of her. He had prescribed could interpose for his rescue, and he met the fate from which he had rescued his fellow-workman. His widow brought suit for compensation against the company, and it passed through the lower courts to the Appellate Court, which has now rendered its decision. It dismisses the claim on the ground that the workman did not meet his death in his work, but in an act of heroic humanity, which, however creditable it was to him, was no part of his duty as an employee of the company. If he had met his death in adjusting the belt, the company might have been liable, but it was not liable for injuries incurred in rendering service to the cause of humanity. It is so with the majority of those who give their lives to the work of saving their fellow-men from going down to eternal death. They might get compensation if they gave their lives to worldly business, but for the services they render it is seldom that there is any adequate reward. The time is coming, however, when He whom they serve will reward them:

They that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars forever and ever. (Daniel 12: 3.)

A Will Found in a Grave.

A number of lawsuits which have been before the courts for a dozen years past came to an unexpected end a few days ago. They arose out of conflicting claims on the estate of a wealthy citizen of Leavenworth, Kans., who was believed to have died without making a will. The condition of the estate was somewhat involved are also to be cut, which will connect the main tunnel with Cripple Creek, Victor, Gillette, and other towns, and with various mines. This means a total length of tunnelling of fully fifty miles, an undertaking greater than has ever yet been attempted by man. Work has been commenced, says the San Francisco Examiner, at both ends of the main tunnel, and it is expected that the whole system will be completed in seven years. It is estimated that the work will cost over twenty million dollars, but the constructors believe that this large sum will be completely balanced by the value of the ores that will be taken out during the progress of the excavations. Independent of the benefit the tunnel is expected to be to mining operations, will be the advantage of bringing the towns around the base of the mountains into closer communication. At present, for example, the shortest way from Colorado Springs to Cripple Creek is fifty-four miles, but the tunnel will reduce it to sixteen miles. Science in these days is making wonderful progress in overcoming natural obstacles and in improving the facilities of communication; we are promised, too, that there will be similar progress in religious work and in that also the result will be to remove obstacles—the obstacles of sin and ignorance—to bring men into a closer brotherhood, and it will be blessed in its progress. But this work will not be done by newly-discovered processes, but by a power hitherto often neglected.

Not by might, nor by power, but by my spirit, saith the Lord of Hosts. Who art thou, O great mountain? Before Zerubbabel thou shalt become a plain. (Zech. 4: 7.)

Paul Preaching to the Jews.

S. S. Lesson for May 9. Acts 13: 26-39. Golden Text, Acts 13: 38. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THE ministry of Paul in Cyprus was at an end; a testimony for God and for the risen Christ had been left throughout the whole island (vers. 5, 6), and the consul, or deputy governor, had become converted. God regulated the movements of his messenger, and Paul was not afraid to leave his converts in such hands. His next sphere of labor, still in company with Barnabas, was Perga in Pamphylia, of which mission nothing is recorded. Paul makes no excuse for this; there are labors of God's messengers of which the record is only on high; it does not therefore follow that the time is wasted or the work a failure. Thence their way led to Antioch in Pisidia. The company of Jewish colonists which met together for the reading of the Scriptures, for prayer and exhortation at this place noticed on the following Sabbath, two striking looking Israelites enter and sit down. Paul was a gentleman and, all the more so, because he was a Christian. He believed that if God wanted him to deliver some message in this synagogue for him, he knew how to make the way for it and, therefore, he did not take things into his own hands. After the reading of the law and the prophets, the rulers of the synagogue sent unto them, saying, "Men and brethren, if ye have any word of exhortation for the people, say on." God had opened the door and, when he openeth, no man shutteth. Sure in his God, Paul had a free hand, and with boldness gave forth the message of salvation with which he was sent of God to these Jewish brethren. "Men of Israel and ye that fear God." As such he appealed to them; Israelites, but Israelites in relation with God. Then he speaks of God as in relation with them, "The God of this people Israel," and so established the great responsibility toward God of his hearers. Referring to their past history, he said: "God . . . chose our fathers, and exalted the people, when they dwelt as strangers in the land of Egypt, and with a high arm brought them out of it." All grace, no word of reproach.

In the Synagogue

In a few words, chosen by the Holy Ghost, Paul brought home to this little company of Jews their national responsibility and sin, and introduced to them God's Messiah. And now he brings forward his Witnesses to the Messiahship of Christ Jesus. The first is John the Baptist. The history of the wonderful awakening which took place under this prophet of the desert had penetrated far and wide. The wonderful scenes of contrition, confession and consolation, the changed lives of the multitudes which emptied Jerusalem and all the towns and villages of Judea for the time to go out into the desert, and flock to the preaching of this stern man with his unflinching message, "Repent ye"—had been described by many eye witnesses to Jewish colonists in other lands. Paul, knowing this, related how John had said, "I am not he," or more correctly, "I am not, but behold there cometh one after me whose shoes of his feet I am not worthy to loose." Such was the first witness which Paul called up.

The next witness was that of "the prophets which are read every Sabbath day." Paul alleged that the inhabitants of Jerusalem and their rulers fulfilled the prophets in condemning Christ. They found no cause of death in him, yet desired they Pilate that he should be slain. But they would only go to a certain length, when they had fulfilled all that was written of him, they could do no more; they took him down from the tree, and laid him in a sepulchre." And then the God of Israel whom his people had rejected from being their king, comes mightily upon the scene again, and himself becomes the third witness of the Messiahship of Jesus: "God raised him from the dead."

And now Paul, from this latter passage, takes up the argument which Peter used on the day of Pentecost. (Acts 2: 24-36). Peter showed how it was not possible that Christ should be holden of death, and by the fact of David's death proves that this quotation from Ps. 16, could not apply to David, but was spoken of Christ. Here Paul declares: "David, after he had in his own generation served the counsel of God, fell on sleep, and was laid unto his fathers, and saw corruption. But he whom God raised again saw no corruption." To a mind opened to receive the Spirit of God, such evidence was unanswerable; and Paul called this wondrous communication "the word of salvation" (ver. 26) "glad tidings" and "the fulfilment of the promise which was made unto the fathers." All this was now before them in the Messiah whom Paul announced to them. And he pressed it home in blessed, but solemn words: "Be it known unto you therefore, men and brethren, that through this man is preached unto you the forgiveness of sins, and by him all that believe are justified from all things from which ye could not be justified by the law of Moses."

Paul knew the issues which hung upon that hour. No doubt a great impression was made: it was the first favorable announcement of Jesus of Nazareth. Hitherto these Antiochan Jews had heard of him, of his miraculous healings and miracles, of his teachings also. But at the same time, the fact that he had been executed as a criminal would blot out from their remembrance all the good which had been spoken of him, and no doubt they regarded his followers as either wicked or deceived persons. But John the Baptist? "all men held John to be a prophet indeed: did he believe in Christ, and count himself unworthy so much as to loose his sandals? The prophets? they must search if these things were so. The resurrection: O how much depended upon this! But forgiveness, justification? What did this stranger mean? Of what did he accuse them? For what did they need pardon?

The offer of forgiveness presupposes that there is sin to be forgiven. God had wonderfully linked himself with his people of old, and they had drawn away from him. What about this generation, what about these Jews of Antioch? Did they also desire to be "like other nations?" Or did they sigh and cry for the abomination that the people of the Lord no more desired acquaintance with him, and were glad to keep him at a distance? Had they part in the rejection of God the Father? Then they would reject God the Son also, and quench God the Holy Ghost, who in the person of Paul was bringing their sin home to them. Paul felt deeply the solemnity of the situation, and said, "Beware therefore, lest that come upon you, which is spoken of in the prophets: Behold ye despisers, and wonder, and perish; for I work a work in your days, a work which ye shall in no wise believe, though a man declare it unto you." An unyielded heart cannot believe, we can only believe as we obey.

But a work was done; some there were who were cut to the heart, many of the Jews and religious proselytes followed Paul and Barnabas. Gladly they spoke with them, and recognizing that the grace of God was in them they persuaded them to continue in it. All were not Jews; Gentiles also were present, and besought the two missionaries to speak to them on the next Sabbath. Here there was more hunger, they had not so much religious reputation to maintain, and "the next Sabbath almost the whole city came together to hear the Word of God." This fact proved what was the state of the heart of most of the Jews. Jealous of Paul's popularity, seeking themselves and not God, they "spoke against those things which were spoken of Paul, contradicting and blaspheming;" yes blaspheming or at least resisting the Holy Ghost! It was a moment of crisis, not only for the Jews of Antioch but for the life of Paul himself. Hitherto he had always preached "to the Jew first" and to the Jew almost exclusively; now he began to perceive that God was calling him to another ministry. Barnabas was one with him and they said boldly, "It was necessary that the Word of God should have been first spoken to you; but seeing ye put it from you, and judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life, lo, we turn to the Gentiles. For so hath the Lord commanded us, saying, I have set thee to be a light to the Gentiles, that thou shouldst be for salvation unto the ends of the earth."

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

THE two missionaries appear to have made no stay at Perga where they landed after their voyage from Cyprus. It was a large town with a thriving trade, but the climate was injurious to strangers, the air being laden with moisture and very malarial. For that or some other reason not given, they left Perga and went across the Taurus Mountains to Antioch in Pisidia, which is in southern Galatia. This town was on higher ground and much more healthy. This Antioch was not so important a place as the town custom observed in the synagogue distinguished strangers were not the congregation, especially such as appeared from their dress to be from Jerusalem, an invitation to present to the two missionaries. I accepted, and we have here the first sermons that was reported. He recognized the two classes and hearers—the Jews whom he addressed as "Men of Israel," and the Gentile proselytes, whom he addresses as "Ye that fear God." His address was singular that of the martyr Stephen (Acts 13: 46) which he had listened about ten years before. It also resembled Peter's on the day of Pentecost (Acts 2). Beginning with a brief recapitulation of history, to which the Jews were tired of listening, and with a reference to their warrior king, to show that he was in sympathy with his audience, he had not parted with his Jewish faith accepting Christianity, he proceeds to show that Christianity is a development, not an opposition to it. The God who had delivered the people from Egypt, and established them in the land, and given the law and the Judges, had now sent his Son, Jesus Christ. He foresees the objection might be raised, that Christ had been rejected by the priests and doctors of the law, and explains it by saying that he had failed to recognize him, and shows how Christ fulfilled the prophecies which had not been fulfilled by the law. The sermon was singularly well adapted with the view of disarming Jewish prejudices. Paul became an adept in the use of parables and epistles. Though he was the Apostle of the Gentiles, he failed to insist that Judaism was the stumbling stone to Christianity and the

The forgiveness of sins. In the time before the war, a merchant of Philadelphia was robbed by a young man in his employ. The young man had been uniformly kind and honest, and the merchant had trusted him with his securities which he had been entrusted to the merchant for safe-keeping. The merchant was exasperated, and declared he would never forgive the thief. One day near the close of the war the young man came into the merchant's office. He was recognized at once by the merchant, who sent a messenger to the police, and locked the door to prevent the young man's escape. But he had no intention of punishing him. He laid on the merchant's desk a letter. The merchant started. It was from his son who had fallen in battle, and the handwriting was like a voice from the grave. It was very brief. Written on torn leaf were the words: "Forgive me for my sake." It was enough. The merchant was penitent, and the plea of the son availed.

To you is the word of this salvation. The Gospel needs this personal application. Many think it does not concern them. A Christian lady was told of a woman who had sunk to the lowest of degradation. Drink and continued association with evil persons had made her almost like a demon in temper. It was dangerous to approach her and even the police dreaded the task of arresting her. When the Christian lady said she was going to visit her in the cell to which she had been taken after one of her outbreaks, her friends tried to dissuade her. "She may kill you," they said. The woman was crouching on the floor in a corner. The visitor went up and laying her hand on her shoulder said, "I want to be a friend to you. This wretched creature did not understand starting to her feet demanded to know who the visitor was and why she came to trouble upon her. "I love you," was the reply, "and Jesus loves you and has sent me to you," and she bent forward and kissed her. "Go away!" shrieked the abandoned woman, "Go away! You break my heart. You put me in my mother's arms. A kind arm went round the woman's shoulders, a few gentle words were spoken and in a short time she was weeping and as docile as a child. After visit was paid and the woman of the same name in Syria, which had been the starting-place of the missionaries, but it was a thriving centre of trade with a considerable population. It stood near the site of the modern village of Yalobatch. Several ruins, among them a temple, a theatre and an aqueduct are still standing and show that it was a highly civilized town. The people, however, were chiefly idolaters, and only in the Jewish synagogues was there any approach to purity of religion. To the synagogue the two missionaries went on the Sabbath and took part in the worship. As subsequent events proved, there was a mixture of Jews and Gentiles among the worshippers. Although Judaism was never an aggressive religion, it attracted intelligent Gentiles, who came in contact with it and they were received as proselytes, on condition of their promising to observe certain of the dietary laws and to refrain from worshipping idols. The early part of the service in the synagogue consisted of the reading of passages from the law and the prophets, on a system similar to that followed now in the lessons of the Protestant Episcopal Church. The order of the Jewish lessons is said to have been arranged by Ezra so as to cover the whole of the Scriptures within a specified time. We infer from some of the expressions Paul used in his speech, that the passages read that morning were the first chapter of Deuteronomy and the first of Isaiah. These are the passages appointed to be read on the forty-fourth Sabbath of the Jewish ecclesiastical year, which is in July. That fact helps to fix the date of Paul's visit. According to the Street Scenes in Cairo.

A Panorama of Variety and Delight for the Tourist who Visits the Old-world City.

FIFTY years have in some respects made a marked change in Cairo, the ancient Egyptian royal city. Hotels are a combination of Europe and the Orient, a population which reveals a sprinkling of all nationality and a "tendering panoramic procession" of character as is to be found nowhere else in the world, save perhaps Constantinople. All combine to make it a plan of our attractions to those fond of the excitement of travel. As to dress, the various colors shown in the garments of the Greeks, Copts, Abyssinians, Nubians, Algerians, and the richly attired sailor runners in advance of the carriage is enough to gratify the eye of any artist.

One of the features of life in Cairo is the street merchant. Stalls of all sorts and "relics" of sacred places are offered for sale on the sidewalk. In the bazaars the noise that fills the ears of the stranger is new, unaccustomed to the quiet of Oriental trading, like the short of a bedlam. There are many tiny booths, and behind each a merchant, perched on the top of his lungs, vying in excellence of his wares, and plagues the passer-by to purchase. Cakes, rice, olives, and other articles of diet are found at one end of a bazaar, and jewelry, silks, bric-a-brac, and rugs at the other. Servants with ostrich plumes, "scarabs" and armor, and tag-side. Down the winding streets, little wider than they come a steady stream of traffic, that includes donkeys and mules, with riders or with loads of merchandise; funeral processions in blue robes, sauntering priests, turbaned Moslems, veiled Turkish women and boys, and a half-hundred of various races and shades of complexion.

The photographs on this page present some of the familiar scenes in Cairo thoroughfares. The coffee stall, its grimy and uninviting interior, and the date-seller's stand, where the dainties, are among the common sights. In some more quiet corners or squares—one may hear the tinkle of music, and come upon such a group as the photograph shows. To European or American ears the Arab music is little better than a hideous discord, yet it seems to afford no little satisfaction to native audiences.

Wing of life in Cairo, Mary Thorn writes, in her recent book, says: "Half after seven all Cairo dines, and the hungry tourist turns gratefully to the booths of Egypt, when they are served at a well-appointed table d'hôte, quite in keeping with semi-Europeanized Cairo. The interior is very beautiful, brightened by the evening dresses of Continental belles seated at two long tables, dining gayly with the English officers, some in Citadel, or striving to put at ease the naive Egyptian wearing an orthodox caftan, who is apparently listening with deep attention to his fair companion. He mentally decides whether to use his fingers or his fork to the "champignons à la crème" handed him by the waiter. The oddest part of the scene is the sprinkling of red head-gear up and down the dining-room, which belongs to the very shade of Eastern complexion—

Copts, Turks, and even Jews, the latter having returned in large numbers to the land of Goshen, this time for the "season" only, when they dwell in beautiful villas and possess hotels and valuable corner lots in their ancient House of Bondage."

Be Kind to the Dumb Animals.

"Kindness to the brute creation" is a maxim that is steadily gaining in strength and significance. Lately THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has received a number of letters on the subject. Mrs. L. K. L. Ozeand, Va., writes:

"I wish to take up the subject 'Cruelty to Animals,' of 'S. C. C., Manchester, N. H.," in your March 24th issue. Oh, if others would speak out against the cruel treatment by man of the poor dumb creatures! I think this a subject for all to turn their help and attention to and try to protect these speechless creatures which thinking, and improper diet of any sort belongs to this category. If what we wrongly eat disturbs the body, and vitiates the blood, its influence may and doubtless does, extend further, and in extreme cases acts as an irritant to the whole body.

Alaskan Roses.

Mrs. Chapman, an American missionary in Alaska, in a recent letter gives this pretty little glimpse of the Arctic summer season:

"It is now June 30th. My window garden is small. I have a little rose that does its best, and has put out about eleven buds this spring. Usually one would blossom just in time for Sunday. To-day Miss Sabine's girls brought in bunches of wild roses, and our room is filled with the fragrance. This is a backward spring with us. The Anvik ice did not go out until the 24th of May, and four days after the ice in the Yukon broke. The water rose forty feet. Miss Sabine came to church in a boat, and the water came into the carpenter shop and saw-mill and onto the floor of the store-house, as it did in the spring of the year in which we came to Anvik. But Miss Sabine's schoolhouse and our house, with the church are high and dry."

This is a picture of Alaska that will be new to those who have hitherto imagined it to be a land of snow

YOU CANNOT SMILE IN VAIN.

THE cost is but a trifle
For a smile when all is well,
But when the heart is heavy
Its cost no one can tell.
'Tis well to practice sometimes
A smile amidst the pain;
Though great the cost 'tis never lost—
You cannot smile in vain.
When summer's sun is shining
And nature's all aglow,
You carry through the sunshine
A smile where'er you go.
But why not smile in winter,
With naught but sleet and rain?
Whate'er the cost, 'twill not be lost—
You cannot smile in vain.
When all around is gladness
And hearts are light and gay,
You'll find a friend to join you
And help you smile that day;
But when the world most needs them
Do not from smiles refrain—
'Twill lift some cross—add gain to loss,
And never be in vain.
It costs you but a little
And brings a rich increase,
So through the clouds and sunshine
Let smiling never cease.
Don't let your smiling all be o'er
When days are slashed with rain;
Crown every day with smile's bright ray—
You cannot smile in vain.

A Word to Mothers.

A LADY in Perris, California, sends us this timely and thoughtful letter:

Dear Editor: I have been forced to notice the careless way in which a certain class of parents are bringing up their young daughters in this sunny State of ours. The results are so pitifully apparent, I pen these few words in their behalf. Do you not remember, dear mother, the first passionate thrill you experienced when holding to your heart for the first time, your baby-girl? Did you not accept the small new-comer as a divine gift; as a God-given trust? And have you not given her the tenderest, truest love of your life, through all the years of childhood's ills? Why should you now, when the plant you have so watched and guarded is blooming into a new life, withdraw the guiding hand and let it be tossed by every breeze of self-will and youthful passion?

How can you throw off the leash of parental authority so lightly and place the guidance of an immortal soul into hands so frail and inexperienced as her own? What wonder that shipwrecks abound, when parents allow their young daughters to do as they please? Dear mothers and fathers, too, you are proud of your girl, no doubt; of her quick answers and native independence, and proud of the number of her admirers. She is innocent, of course, and guileless; but I ask you, how long ago was it that your neighbor's girl was innocent also? Is yours any stronger to resist temptation? And so long as your daughter is allowed to go out evenings on long rides with any young man who chances to invite her, she is in temptation's way.

Give the girl a higher aim in life. Let her take up something new to fill the empty spaces of her time; let her learn the intricacies of house-keeping or cooking as an art, or give her music, or painting, or gardening; anything she will find educative or instructive to tide her over the formative period of her existence. Keep her from doing things she will blush to remember in years to come. The tempter is abroad. Fortify the young life against his arrows. And who is so well fitted for the task as those designed by nature to be her protectors. Keep her where she will not be exposed to temptations which will bring disgrace to herself and to you. Let her father's house be to her always a haven of rest and safety. Above all teach her to look for help from the one unerring guide. MRS. J. A. S.

Home Singing.

The songs sung by a family circle, may some day for aught we know be the voice that will recall a dear one from ruin, for the same sweet words will come back, be heard and loved in after years. In a cottage or mansion this pleasure can attend us with perpetual sunshine. Wealth may surround us with its blandishments, and beauty may gain admirers, but a home, void of music, is like a garden without flowers. It sends an ever-swelling stream of love through a household. It takes away the sting of disappointment and sorrow, and in the heart that has been touched by the finger of pain, it finds a place where it murmurs its sweetest chords.

A CAFE KEEPER. A SELLER OF DATES. PUBLIC MUSICIANS. STREET SCENES IN THE CITY OF CAIRO, EGYPT.

God has placed under our care. Being dumb should really be a cause of their being treated better. Surely God will punish any one, and justly, for bad treatment to animals. May THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in all its grand work, aid in the prevention of cruelty to animals. How many of its readers will help?"

Diet and Morals.

It is unquestionable that the subject of the relation between diet and morals is coming to the front as a problem for some generation in the near future to grapple with. It is certainly a proper subject for parents to study carefully. Mr. M. V. Shaler in a recent article on the matter, wrote: "We are told by the best authority that we must come to the realization that 'not merely our health, our strength, and our incomes, but our higher intellectual life, and even to some extent our morals, depend upon the care which we take of our bodies, and among the things essential to health and wealth, to right thinking and right living, one, and that not the least important, is our diet.' It is our great fortune to have learned this—to be told that the science of food reaches to every point on the line of battle for existence." Intelligently directed, diet may be made a moral as well as a physical agent, and parents would do well to consider this. Gross eating tends to gross habits and and ice, where flowers and vegetation are almost unknown.

A Tea-Table Legend.

To those who have noticed that the leaves of the tea-plant are shaped like eye-lids, it may be interesting to know that there is an ancient Chinese legend concerning the plant which professes to explain its peculiar shape. According to the story, there once lived a pious hermit who prayed almost incessantly. He was, however, unable to keep awake as long as he wished, and he cut off the offending eye-lids and cast them upon the ground. But this action was observed by a good spirit, who immediately caused a tea shrub to spring up from the spot where the eye-lids had fallen. It is in reference to this, according to the legend, that the leaves of the tea plant are shaped like eye-lids, fringed with lashes, and possesses the power of warding off sleep.

A Child's Fear of the Dark.

"There's a little verse in the Bible, my darling," said a mother to her child, "that's meant for you when you awake in the dark. It is a verse out of one of David's psalms: 'What time I am afraid, I will trust in thee.' Whenever you are afraid, you can say it over as a loving prayer, and the Good Shepherd will keep you from all harm."

EUROPE'S GREAT WAR BEGUN.

Turkey and Greece in Deadly Conflict—Battles Fought on the Northern Frontier—Fighting by Land and Sea.

MOUNT OLYMPUS, FROM THE PLAINS OF THESSALY.

GREECE and Turkey have at last proceeded to hostilities, and the long impending war in Eastern Europe has begun in terrible earnest. After several raids across the border by Greek irregulars in which the invaders appeared to have a decided advantage, the situation became so strained that war could no longer be averted. A declaration of war by Turkey was precipitated by a hot encounter between Turkish and Greek regular troops at Nezeros, on the Greek frontier line in Thessaly, and south of Mount Olympus. The Turks were driven back at all points. On hearing the news of this fight, the Sultan's Ministerial Council at Constantinople declared war, and ordered Edhem Pasha, the commander of the Turkish forces, to assume the offensive. At the same time the Greek Minister at Constantinople received his passports, and all Greeks were ordered to leave Turkish territory. Hot encounters occurred between Turkish and Greek troops at Preveza, Karya, and along the whole frontier line from Reveni to Nezeros, the Greeks succeeding at nearly all except Menexao, where the Turks occupied an impregnable position. At Milouna Pass, an important strategic point, the fighting was desperate, and over 20,000 men were engaged, the Turks having the advantage. Both sides sustained severe losses. The capture of Milouna by the Turks will open to them the Plains of Thessaly, and they may now be able to push the campaign to advantage with their heavy artillery. Both armies are full of enthusiasm and determination.

Thus far the principal fighting has been carried on in wholly classic ground. There is hardly a foot of Greece's ancient soil that is not hallowed by the memory of some one of the multitude of heroic events that have contributed to make Grecian history the admiration of the world. Probably the most famous of all is that region which is now the scene of military operations and which threatens to shortly become the theatre of a great war between the Hellenic race and its Moslem oppressors. Mount Olympus, from whose peaks can be seen the camps of both Greeks and Turks, has been immortalized in the Homeric poems as the battle-ground of mortals and demigods and in ancient Greek mythology it was the seat of Jove himself.

At the extreme north-west corner of the great plain of Thessaly there suddenly rises above the river Peneus to the height of about 1500 feet the great rocks of Meteora, a spur of the Pindus range. At the vine-clad foot of the precipice lies the little town of Kalibaki, now the scene of much activity as the mustering point of the Greek battalions. Perched upon the summits of these rocks are the famous monasteries of Meteora. The monasteries of Metamorphosis and St. Barlaam are reached by a series of hanging ladders, or by means of a net at the end of a rope, which is wound up by a capstan. In the event of hostilities their position may prove a protection to many. The Vale of Tempe, so famous for its scenic beauties that its name became a synonym in classical literature for any valley of especial loveliness, is associated with classical poetry, and more particularly with the heathen worship of Apollo, rather than with military excursions such as are now rousing the Thessalian frontier of Greece. This picturesque valley, now more generally known as Lykostomo, is a ravine cleft through rocks of massive marble between the mountain slopes of Olympus and Ossa, and forms a channel for the river Peneus on its way to the Aegean Sea. It is about five miles in length, and varies considerably in breadth at different points affording throughout, however, the least difficult passage through the mountains of north-eastern Thessaly. The valley runs close to the Greek frontier line, for its northern bank is formed by the outlying spurs of Mount Olympus, and Mount Olympus itself belongs by the ruling of the Convention to Turkey. This latter fact alone has caused much bitterness among the Greeks, who, remembering their old military fame as a nation, and the close association the mountain bears to many of the leading events of Grecian history, have declared that their country can never be free until the Greek flag once more flies upon its historic peaks. Recently, during a raid on the Turkish side of the frontier by several large bands of irregulars, fitted out by a Greek patriotic society at Athens, a party succeeded in raising the Greek flag on one of the slopes of Olympus and this feat was hailed with wild acclamations by

probably 150,000 troops at the frontier as against Greece's 80,000. But the Sultan has enemies on every side who have been emboldened by the recent Greek successes. Especially will he have to watch the frontier of Montenegro. Edhem Pasha's plan of campaign is to advance and take Larissa, then endeavor to seize the pass of Thermopylae. But Greece has a strong force posted there, and the most determined resistance would be encountered. Greece expects to seize Chios and Samos

(both renowned in ancient classic times), to capture Epirus, and then advance into Macedonia. They depend upon receiving assistance from Montenegro, Bulgaria, Albania and Macedonia.

The general impression in Europe at the present time seems to be that the war will be a short one, and that unless Greece receives the aid of allies she will be unable to repel by her land forces any Turkish invasion, although she can readily hold her own by sea.

THE WISE SON.

Nothing in our Western civilization surprises the visitor from Oriental lands more than the lack of respect rendered by youth to age. In China, Japan, India, Persia and other countries in the far East the behavior of some children to their parents would be accounted a crime. It certainly is not from our religion that the spirit of undutifulness springs. The Bible, throughout, enjoins on the young respect for the aged and particularly for parents. The wisdom inculcated in the passages selected for the topic, (Prov. 10: 1: 30: 17), is not the wisdom of self-confidence, but of obedience and reverence. The wise son is not he who regulates his own life and follows his own devices, but he who takes his father's advice and submits to his father's direction. But our boys generally regard their fathers' ideas as antiquated and exploded and are disposed to regard their fathers as merely providers, whose functions are limited to supplying funds. Yet reason, apart from religious principle, is opposed to this conception of

TURKISH ZOUAVES AND CAVALRY.

King George's subjects who regarded it as an omen of good success in the impending war.

All the European nations are watching the issue with eager interest. Turkey has the relation. If the elder man has less knowledge than his son, he has the benefit of experience which is a most efficient teacher and imparts lessons that are not readily forgotten. How many fathers mourn as they see their sons taking the path which must lead to disaster! Experience and observation enable them to foresee the end of the course. They know how the young man is being befooled. They know the power of the temptations which are operating upon him and the folly of the youthful idea that it is possible to quaff the cup of pleasure and avoid the dregs at the bottom. It grieves them that their sons should "sow their wild oats," as they realize what the inevitable harvest must be. Thus the lives of the fathers and the bitter fruits of experience are wasted. The father's warning is accounted the croaking of "the old fogey," and is disregarded. Only at last when they mourn over a wasted life do they realize that the wise son was he who heeded the disinterested counsel of his parents.

ASCENSION.

What other end could be consistent with life as that of Christ? The Evangelist passed out of this world, not knowing. It may near to us, or far removed, but this went and there his people will go mansion he prepares for them. And again during those wonderful days, he had disappeared from the of his bewildered followers, but last, they realized that his departure final. As we are told in the past: the day, (Acts 1: 5-12.) He passed the cloud and they saw him no more they had no doubt of his continuance. He was with God and that that he still lived to witness their and their trials and to bless them, better so. He spoke truly when it is expedient for you that I go. Had he continued his beneficent the earth, there would have been rialism and a localization which have marred our conception of vinity. The world would have him, not for the spiritual blessings holiness and spiritual development he is able to impart. Had he died a time we must have lost confidence in divinity; had he lived on perpetually must have lost our conception of finity and his experience; but as he into heaven with his human body made heaven a home to all belief has given us a connecting link with mysterious abode which draws us and makes it real to us.

Silent Preachers in Mexico.

In acknowledging the receipt of a contribution from readers of this journal W. C. Evans, writes: The district which I am Presiding Elder has of about 15,000 square miles and a population of about 1,000,000, but as this I am publishing agent for our Mexico and of this I would speak the importance of this particular part of missionary work can scarcely be appreciated without a knowledge of all the conditions affecting our work, and the opportunities the printed page gives in preaching the Gospel of the blessed. It is not an uncommon sight here native reading to his assembled congregation and so willingly will they read while another reads, that anything is printed is read with avidity. The literature which is to be had in cheap form is such as will only destroy virtue, foster vice and ruin soul, and in no wise uplift or bless. The American Bible Society is doing work here in the distribution of Bibles, great and lasting good may also be accomplished by the distribution of those silent messengers going everywhere many times where the missionary is not. This we are doing as far as we can. Mr. Evans is now visiting this district and will be glad to describe his work in Mexico to churches or individuals interested. His address during stay will be Steubenville, Ohio.

LOVE FOR JESUS.

Why the Character of Our Lord Inspires the Love of Men of All Races and is the Ideal of All Ages.

There is need that at times we ask ourselves the question of the topic: "Why do we love Jesus?" The passages of Scripture associated with it (1. John 4: 19 and John 3: 14-17), answer the question in part. It is true that we love him because he first loved us, and that we love him because through him we have everlasting life, but there is much more than this. We know in our ordinary experience that love does not always elicit love and that one may feel attracted to a person whom it is impossible to love. The explanation includes qualities in him which inspire love. It is strange, when we think of it, how we ignore the people who have realized these things. Among ourselves how different are the ideals of different men! We see in marriage, in friendship, in literature, in religious association, and in every political contest. Men do not conform to their ideals. One is attracted by one quality, and another by another. Yet from all classes, from all professions, from among women and men, as well as men, there come some who bend in adoration before this Jesus and find in him that which satisfies their natures. The untutored savage knows it, as does the man of culture and refinement, the man of action as the man of contemplation, the poor and the rich, the humble and the ambitious. It is remarkable that the fanatics and scoffers who assail Christianity and the Bible, seldom have the courage to say against Christ himself. It was by no means of that colorless, negative type of character, which has been the criticism by general concession. He spoke positively on many subjects, and on occasion his indignation blazed out in full expression in words that were cooled and withered. Nor were his arguments small. Those who would deny him, must give him the first place as a boy, wife and child, father and mother, and they must give up the most dearly cherished sins for his sake.

Centuries have passed, but the number of those who love him increases in every generation. Great men arise and win the world's gaze, winning our respect and admiration and affection, but Jesus holds his place still, so far removed above them that there is no hint of rivalry. Explain the fact as we may, we cannot deny it. He has today the supreme affection, the wholehearted devotion of more of the world's population than are rendered to any man who ever lived. Neither Buddha nor Mohammed, numerous as their followers are, inspired the personal loyalty that we render to Christ. The portraits of the evangelists draw of him are not mixed pictures, but they are sufficient. As we see him feeding the crowd, healing the sick, mingling with the people in their festivities, speaking kindly to the penitent, taking the children in his arms, teaching forbearance and magnanimity, showing gentleness to the erring, meekly enduring unjust accusation, submitting to chastisement and death and laying even for his murderers—we draw near to him and feel that in him we have a lovable friend, one who deserves all our love. The incarnation is a mystery we cannot fully comprehend, but it, and alone explains Christ. We see God in him. His life and character are the consummation of revelation. The world needed him to understand God. It had dimly seen God in creation; it had caught another glimpse of his character on Sinai; it had seen something of him in providence, but it did not know him till Jesus came. All that he told us of the Father shone out in his life. What God is in his infinite tenderness, in his love and compassion, he taught by parable and multitude, but better than all by his own life. He never uttered a more pregnant word than when he said: "He that hath seen me, hath seen the Father." As we gaze in his life the divine attributes in human environment, we involuntarily share our feeling toward God from awe to long reverence.

INDIA'S NEED.

WE sit at our tables lavishly spread
And eat of our dainty fare,
While our brothers afar are crying for bread,
O can we not something spare?

With rosy faces and sparkling eyes
Our children around us stand;
Shall we not give heed to the wailing cries
Of the children of that far land?

So pinched with hunger, and poor and weak,
They totter, and faint, and fall,
While fathers and mothers in anguish hear
Their dying children call

For bread, for bread; O merciful Lord,
Open the hearts of men,
Help us to give from our bountiful store
Till the harvest comes again.

Brothers are we, for of one blood
Are all nations under the sun;
Thou hast blest us: O help us to bless
And aid these sorrowing ones.

Then in that great day He will not say,
"I was hungry, ye gave me no meat,"
But "Come ye blessed, abide with me,
And sit at your Saviour's feet."

THREE PILLOWS.

My head is resting very sweetly on three pillows:
infinite power, infinite love, and infinite wisdom.

THREE pillows underneath my head,
And thus I sweetly rest,
While not a wave of trouble rolls
Across my peaceful breast;
Infinite power my father has,
All things he can bestow,
No needed good will he withhold,
Trusting, I rest me so.

Infinite love. O, joy most rare,
With this dear name is given,
Bringing to earth a foretaste sweet,
The joy, the air of heaven.
Infinite wisdom—so he gives
From out his bounteous store
Just what is best for me, his child,
And can I ask for more?

So on these pillows, still I rest,
Thy wisdom, power and love,
While all the teachings of my life,
Thy loving-kindness prove.
I want that for my guide in life,
That still will cheer in death.
Pillow my heart on Jesus' breast,
Trusting till latest breath.

THE COMING TRIBULATION.

To Involve the World and Nominal Christians in Calamity After the Rapture of Waiting Believers.

BY REV. F. L. CHAPPELL.*

THE Scriptures abound in statements showing that the Church is in tribulation, or persecution, of some sort as long as she is in the world. But we are also taught that as the age draws to a close, and the world grows strong and God-defying, that the tribulation of the church will increase, so that it will end in sharp persecution, as did the days of Christ on earth, who was the Head of the Church; for as he was, so are we in the world. Therefore the closing days of the age are emphatically to be the days of tribulation for the Church.

But, over and above all these representations, there is a certain tribulation mentioned in Scripture which is called "the great tribulation," a time of trouble such as never was before, and such as shall never be again. It is mentioned with great particularity in connection with the career of the Antichrist, the resurrection of some of the dead, and other notable events of the very last days. Christ refers to it in very much the same language, and it seems to be pointed out in Rev. 7: 14, by the emphatic and distinctive expression, as seen in the original, "the tribulation the great one."

Now, the great question arises, is this great tribulation that of the Church or that of the world? It cannot properly be both since they are not contemporaneous. The world prospers up to the taking away of the Church, and therefore cannot be in tribulation of this superlative character. Remember always that the Church we are now talking of is not the nominal, mixed, worldly company that so largely prevails, but the distinctively pure Church that holds itself ready for rapture. Is the great tribulation the tribulation of this Church or the tribulation of the world, which may indeed include worldly professing Christians? Just a few references will show that it is the tribulation of the world and not of the Church. For the subject of it evidently has an anti-Christian aspect. It is a tribulation of judgment rather than one of discipline. It has distinctively Jewish aspects, being called "the time of Jacob's trouble." It includes war, famine, pestilence, burning, and almost every horror as set forth in so large a part of the book of Revelation, making a tribulation under which men grow blasphemous and God-defying instead of patient and humble. Moreover, in the very nature of the case we see that judgment, tribulation on the world, is much more worthy of being called "the great," than disciplinary tribulation on the saints. Not that but some saints may come out of it, being brought out of the slumber in which they had hitherto indulged. When, therefore, it is asked will the Church pass through the tribulation? it is well to ask what Church and what tribulation?

If you mean the pure Church and the disciplinary tribulation, it must be answered yes, "through much tribulation we must enter into the kingdom of God." But if you mean the pure Church and "the great tribulation," it must be answered no; for such are exhorted "to live that they may escape all these things," and of such it is written that they shall not come into judgment," which is the nature of the great tribulation. But if it is meant the nominal, worldly, slumbering Church, and the disciplinary tribulation of the Church, we answer yes. The common so-called Church will come into tribulation, and many of her members, we trust, will be awakened and be led to become ready for rapture, while perhaps others will be so deluded in their worldliness that only the following great tribulation will awaken them. We may hope that when the worldly Christian sees the true Church withdrawn, he will repent and turn to God for grace. Then, although he must pass through the tribulation, he may finally be saved.

SERVING THE SICK POOR.

Rose Hawthorne Lathrop Writes of Her Work Among the Cancer Patients of the New York Slums.

HERE are many Christian men and women, of the modest and unpretentious sort, who are doing heroic service for humanity and religion almost unknown to the rest of mankind. That the few, whose deeds do come to the light of publicity, do not receive from their fellows that generous sympathy and encouragement which such work deserves, is to be greatly regretted. Few there are who give more than a passing thought to the privations of the brave medical missionaries laboring in foreign lands, while those noble souls who have consecrated their lives to the task of aiding the leprous, the cancerous, and others afflicted with incurable diseases, at which humanity recoils, are all too seldom remembered, even by professing Christians.

It is now nearly a year since Mrs. Rose Hawthorne Lathrop, the daughter of the distinguished American author Nathaniel Hawthorne, voluntarily left society to devote her life to the care of the cancerous poor in the tenements of lower New York. She has written her experience in that loving Christian work for the benefit of the readers of this journal, and we bespeak for her and her efforts their cordial sympathy and support.

MRS. LATHROP'S OWN STORY.

I am trying to serve the poor as a servant. I wish to serve the cancerous poor because they are avoided more than any other class of sufferers; and I wish to go to them as a poor creature myself, though powerful to help through the open-handed gifts of public kindness, because it is by humility and sacrifice alone that we become worthy to feel the holy spirit of pity, and to carry into the disorders of destitute sickness the cheerful love we have gathered from the Heavenly Kingdom for distribution.

In tending the sick poor, we must band ourselves not by twos and threes but by twenties and fifties; and every group of women thus working should be made up of souls who are in love with self-denial. In order to accomplish anything that will be lasting, women must be called who are capable of renouncing ease and pastime, for the sake of that true love of God which shares the sufferings of Christ in a mode of life which he recommended and lived. Without just such labors the work I advocate cannot flourish. Anyone who reads the historical records of charity (deserving the name) can discover what such labors accomplish in evolving. An activity that may be felt everywhere; and I hope for the sake of so great a benefit to the larger number, women will realize that self-consecration is even now both fitting and possible on the very lines made clear by sturdy and spiritual workers of the past.

THE VALUE OF SYMPATHY.

Who does not know the effect of persons of our acquaintance who are ready to step forward when serious sickness attacks us? Quiet and determined and free from personal passions, the helper makes light of her sacrifices and fatigues, and when we thank her, smiled with a happiness that shows her Redeemer thanked her already. Imagine a dozen or so of these women in a hospital for a class of the poor who is usually abandoned and left to suffer in solitary neglect, and then admit that we need such a charity in New York, and believe that we can have it. It is a hope to plead for with a will; a source of the common weal to legions of generous impulses to create by concerted action, which among women is a force that has already done so much in other directions. It is my desire to bring nurses together under this ensign, by spreading a knowledge of our need for such an army, who will be moved by the strength of true love against the evil of cowardly indifference.

My first step was to experiment upon the ground myself in order to know something of what should be expected in the way of endurance and capacity. I have proceeded altogether upon a business method of learning a trade, leaving it, as is usually the case, to my native ability to determine whether I should remain in the work as office worker, or rise in it to partnership. My opinion is that I now have an intimate view of poverty and destitute sickness, which I could not have obtained otherwise than by throwing in my lot with those I wish to aid.

Among the points which I have settled to my own satisfaction are these: I find that good health is not a requisite, because determination refreshed by faith will probably pull one through a vast amount of fatigue and exposure. A thorough training as a nurse is not a requisite, because a woman with the right instincts will do very clever things for the comfort and welfare of the sick, though she does not know the names of the bones and muscles she handles, and leaves it to the physician to decide all scientific questions. Knowledge is a blessed provision of course, and never comes amiss, but it is fortunately true that the poor sick who have no care whatever can be relieved by care that is not based upon anything but a quick intelligence, even a loving earnestness. A very young and inexperienced mother is sometimes able to tend her child more completely than any one else. It is with such quickness that we can nurse the sick poor if we do so religiously. A trained nurse who has studied the matter as a profession by which she can earn more money than by any other, is liable to temptations which are not conducive to inspiration and beneficence, and make her less acceptable than an untrained friend. Ask the sick what they think on this point.

DANGERS USUALLY EXAGGERATED.

It is not necessary to fear contagion of any description. I could hardly have more saucily risked disaster than I have done on this score, being sure that there was exaggerated panic in regard to it; and I am now convinced that the average of dangers is extremely small.

Photograph for The Christian Herald.

MRS. LATHROP AMONG HER CANCER PATIENTS IN HER TENEMENT HOME.

The stagnation which exists in personal charity from this fear of contagion is unwarranted and base. It is not necessary to fear lawless characters in the slums. The drunken men are so polite and considerate that it is pathetic, and the rough ones I have not consciously encountered in five months, and I know even they, must have their gentle side.

I have found that a woman intent upon doing something obedient to God's expressed wishes can indeed do something, however little, that is of vital use to a few invalids. Is not a little enough to do? One can leave it wholly to God to make the effort larger in its scale of usefulness, provided we are on the alert not to make the number of our beneficiaries small through our laziness or stupor. The quality of our kindness is all that it is our duty to determine with restless anxiety, after we have calmly moved every mountain we can stir, lying in the way of the aggrandizement of the charity we have chosen.

WELCOMED BY THE SICK POOR.

When I first visited the sick I fancied that a trial of my skill and ability would lead to my prompt dismissal from the field by my poor friends. Now I see that I can be of such profound help, that I do not know what form of dismissal would get rid of me. But the sick do not by any means discourage me from coming. Every day is made beautiful by gratitude and welcome so genuine and strong with true life that I seem to be brushed aside by one who says: "I am here!" It is a privilege, is it not, to be near such vivid hope and love?

I am sure that there is a great advantage in sharing the conditions of the poor if we endeavor to assist them. I could never be penetrating enough to know what I wanted to do to relieve the sufferings of poverty if I were not on the spot to investigate squalor, hunger, houselessness, and all the rest of it. We must be of the poor if we would constitute ourselves the organs by which they are nourished. I shrink instinctively from little luxuries and furbelows that are not common with the poorest people I deal with and for. I had expected to secure neatness, though I was eager not to grant myself very different arrangements from those endured by the poor. I have discovered how difficult it is to be neat in a crowded tenement, meagre in water supplies and every facility; and I would not have missed this revelation for anything. Many a fact has cropped up at odd moments that tells me what to do, and what to hope for those I tend; and why they are benighted and violent and intemperate and slovenly; and how good and brave and patient and industrious they are through every overflow of misery. By being of the poor as a member one detects the averages of different indications, hopeful or dark, and learns what deadly drawbacks are to be stoutly defied and frayed out of existence. I could testify to the hideousness of noise and dirt and odors and outcries, of occasional arrests and stormy wrangles and woe, once in awhile making the heart fail and memories of pleasantness and ease come like doves to induce us to leave the mad confusion.

THE VOICE OF THE CHILDREN.

On the first night of my life in a new and at that time alarming scene, the cheerful voices of children upon the street close to my windows gave me a sense of safety. Ever since the children have made me very happy by being so happy and so kind. The joy of little children who feel with wonderful intuition the sincerity of a person who would do anything for their benefit, when your steps approach

THE APOCRYPHA.

BETWEEN the prophet and the birth of Jesus Baptist there is a period of four hundred years, which not a line of Scripture was given, obscure but very important. It is however covered by the books Apocrypha; Greek writings, containing, ethical treatises, poems, visions, legendary stories. The religious tone of the book is less spiritual than the Scriptures; its angelology inclines to superstition taken altogether, it is a marvellous book useful to all Christians, and indispensable to Bible students.

In the first place, the Apocrypha gives testimony to the Holy Scriptures. So it would not be possible for us to understand the last days of Judaism without it. Thirdly, the student of the New Testament finds in this book, side-lights of immense value; the doctrines in Ecclesiastes and the Book of Wisdom shed much upon the first chapter of St. John's Gospel on the Messianic hope, and the resurrection. Again, even the language of some books is so similar and striking, that Plumptre thought Apollonius to be the author of the Book of Wisdom, and the Epistle to the Hebrews; the first before his conversion after it—for instance that phrase in Hebrews 1:3, "The brightness of his glory," recalls at once the similar phrase in Wisdom, "the effulgence of the eternal light."

Many of its phrases we use constantly, not being mindful of the source from which they came. John Bunyan says in "Abounding" that he got great comfort from words which he vainly "within the four corners of the Bible." "Look at the generations of old, I see did any ever trust in the Lord, he was confounded." A year after he found them to his great joy, Ecclesiastes 2:10, and he found the whole of this chapter to be a wonderful one. The Book of Tobit have been well studied by Milton; it explains why he calls Raphael an "affable angel." The mention of "ignorances" in the Litany, a part of the Collect for Good Friday, which declares God "hatesth which thou hast made" come from Apocrypha; so also does the lesson in the service for All Souls. "But the souls of the righteous are in the hand of God, and there no torment toucheth them."

"In the sight of the unwise they die; and their departure is taken in misery."

"And their going from us is destruction; but they are in peace."

"For though they be punished in sight of men, yet is their hope of immortality."

"And having been a little chastised, they shall be greatly rewarded; and they shall be found to have proved them, and found them for themselves." In like manner, the Fourth of Wisdom reads on the anniversary of a saint, and not unfrequently at the service.

And for this purpose what is more suitable than such as these: "He being made perfect in a short time, fulfilled a long time; soul pleased the Lord; therefore he, to take him away from the wicked." The grand words of Handel's anthem, "His body is but peace, but his soul liveth forevermore from thee Apocrypha, and few of the words of Wesley, singing, "Jesus, lover of my soul," think they are singing the words of the twenty-sixth verse of the Wisdom of Solomon. Indeed, a long article could be written of quotations from this Book, familiar to students of Christians, ignorant of their source.

It must also be noted that Christ is familiar with the Book of Esdras, for he quotes from the first chapter of the second of the 10th, 20th, 30th, 33d verses; and he is prophesied by name and date, in the fourth chapter of the second of Esdras, 28th and 29th verses; also in the second of the same Book, and the 34th verse.

In the fourth chapter of Tobit we find, "If thou hast abundance, give alms; if thou hast but little, be not at give according to that little." In the 12th of Tobit there are directions for the kindred of the father and mother-in-law, a strong definition of a covetous man from Ecclesiastes 10:9: "There is not a more foolish thing than a covetous man; for such setteth his own soul to strife." In the book (14:14) is an advice we all need to "Defraud not thyself of a good day; could there be a more perfect marriage than that found in Tobit 8:7? "We ordain that we may grow old together. From such wealth it is hard to choose conclusion, no one can miss the strength of comfort of this verse, from second of the 16th chapter and 75th verse: "Be not in doubt, for God is your guide."

HEROIC PERSONALITIES

By REV LOUIS ALBERT BANKS, DD

TUNNELING FOR A SOUL.

It has been my privilege to ride in a railway train through the four greatest tunnels in the world: the Mullin tunnel on the Northern Pacific Railroad in Montana; the Hoosack tunnel in Massachusetts through Mt. Cenis in Italy; and, of all, through that marvel of engineering which hurls a train sheer up the St. Gothard Alps, with six hundred feet of snow and ice above it. I know of an infinitely more interesting and significant tunnel than either of these. It is the tunnel from Helen Keller's finger-tips along the line of her back into the brain and heart that a few years ago were imprisoned in Egyptian-like darkness. A few weeks since I was riding on the ship in the central part of New York and on opening the morning paper, received from the newsboy, I saw a list of headlines that caused the tears to run down my cheeks, so profoundly they emotions stirred. The headlines told that Helen Keller had the day before virtually passed the preliminary examination for entrance to Radcliffe College, in Cambridge, Mass. Perhaps I was more deeply on the subject because of the fact that I was living in South Boston when Helen Keller first came there in Alabama for training under the protection of the Perkins Institution for the blind and had been from the first deeply interested in the brave and self-denying effort put forth to rescue her from her bondage. Young people who have all their senses, do not have found their preparation for the life fraught with difficulties sufficient to give them their best energy and endurance. I was appalled before one who only a few years ago was wrapped about by a prison wall. Think of it. Eyes closed, both closed. Two of the ordinary windows of life shut up and closely shut. Only the one possible means of communication, and that the nerve in the finger-tip. Back along that nerve went the patient, persevering effort of the fingers, knocking at the cell door of an imprisoned soul. There was a soul there, north tunneling for. With enthusiasm and gladness it awoke to the new light and liberty that was offered it. And now, a few years later, so heroically has this liberated soul set herself to work to conquer all obstacles, that we have a young girl whose acquirements would be northern brilliant if no window of the soul had ever been closed against her. If she is close enough to anyone to put her delicate finger on the lips, she receives from them with accuracy everything they speak to her, and replies in elegant English and in softly modulated tones the sounds of which she herself never hears. She reaches forth after all knowledge possible for mortals to know. She is tireless in her explorations, and gives promise of an intellectual triumph that shall be the marvel of our time.

Photograph by A. Merritt H. Berto. HELEN KELLER.

Surely, all things considered, to Helen Keller must be given the palm for heroism among all the young women of the present generation.

Edmund Clarence Stedman sings a beautiful ode to Helen Keller:

"Mute, sightless visitant,
From what uncharted world
Hast voyaged into life's wide sea
With guidance scant?
As if some bark mysteriously
Should lither glide with spars aslant
And sails all turled."

But Helen Keller has not been willing to leave the sails furled, but has aroused herself to meet every breeze that offered, until, in spite of all obstacles, she is entering her young womanhood with all sails spread to the winds of life.

The Christian religion, with its love and trust and hope, has come to Helen Keller's mind and heart as naturally as the love of mother or friends. To great-souled Phillips Brooks was granted the rare privilege, a few years since, of answering the questions of her inquiring mind in regard to spiritual things. The correspondence, which was published at the time, was one of great interest.

If it is a matter of so much importance to carry the light of intelligence and love into one human mind and heart that has been shut about by imprisoning walls, how splendid is the opportunity of the Christian church to carry the Bible, and the civilization that follows in its wake, to the millions in heathen lands, who are shut in by the dark walls of their ignorance and superstition, until they are as dead to all that is beautiful in the world as was Helen Keller before she had any means of communication with her fellow beings.

One With an Attendance of Sixty-five Years and Another of Sixty—More Remarkable Records.

THE friendly rivalry stirred up by our Sunday School championship competition, is still filling our mail with letters from pastors, superintendents, teachers, and parents in all parts of the Union, giving us the names of new candidates, many of whom have attended Sunday School faithfully for a very long period. Some, however, are ineligible because of one or more absences during the past five years, the requirements being that the attendances must be continuous. Several weeks ago we published a letter from Quarries' Presbyterian Church Sunday School, Granite, Md., giving the record of Mrs. Sarah Ann Spicer as sixty-five years of constant Sunday School attendance. We have since received a letter from the superintendent of the Sunday School, and find that Mrs. Spicer has been absent since July, 1896. Her wonderful record of 65 years of faithfulness is full of interest. Mrs. Spicer, who is now in her seventy-ninth year, has been in constant attendance at the Quarries Presbyterian Church Sunday School from its inception beginning when ten years of age, attending during the perilous times of the war, never deterred by inclement weather and often going through snow several feet deep to light the fires, serving faithfully for sixty-five years. Mrs. Spicer is now confined to her home, but is always intensely interested in anything which concerns the church of her girlhood.

Miss Phoebe C. Edgar, Rahway, N. J., is now a teacher in the Bible Class of the Second Presbyterian Church Sunday School, and has been such for the past sixty years without an absence of six consecutive Sundays from her class. She is now seventy-eight years old.

Mrs. Amy C. Mansfield has been a member of the Congregational Sunday School, Dummerston, Vt., as pupil and teacher for sixty-eight years. She began to attend Sunday School when five years old, and since that time has been absent only a few times through illness.

Mr. Geo. Bridges, Superintendent Bible Mission Sunday School, Carlisle, Pa., writes us that Mrs. Emma Corbet has a record of twenty-four years consecutive Sunday School attendance without one absence. Mr. W. A. Walker, of the First Baptist Sunday School, Norfolk, Va., has been present every Sunday during the past nine years and four months, or 485 consecutive Sundays. Jasper Cope, Prospect, O., has attended Sunday School for twelve years, and has been absent only five times. Myrtle Hyers, of Presbyterian Sunday School, Mechanicsburgh, Pa., has a record of six years and fifteen weeks, or 327 consecutive Sunday School attendances. Samuel Winterton entered the First Baptist Sunday School, Keyport, N. J., in September, 1863, and to date has not missed a Sunday. Mr. Chas. R. Hopson, Superintendent of Grace M. E. Church, Paterson, N. J., writes: "Miss Lillian Moriat has attended our Sabbath School every Sunday for the past ten years without missing a session, also Mr. Peter H. Stagg, of the same Sunday School, has been present for 250 consecutive Sundays." The entries in the present contest will close June 1.

A STORY OF THE BROADER CHRIST-LIFE

CHAPTER X—Cont'd.
A Great Victory.

BY

AMELIA E. BARR.

THAT night Jessie considered it decorous to dress with a dark splendor that was very becoming to her. She declined to dance, and her face wore the expression of one who has seen a great sorrow, and is full of the sympathetic remembrance of it. All these circumstances gave a certain Mr. Belton a good excuse for lingering at her side, in order to give her what comfort he could by talking over the sad family events. He had known Nicholas Lloyd well, and he was not averse to speaking his mind plainly about the financier.

"I see that his affairs are in the hands of Phillips & Co., for settlement, and that they have advertised for your husband, madame. Upon my word a strange thing! An incomprehensible thing!"

"But why? I think it very natural."

"First, that he should ever be able to leave your side. Second, that you at least should not know where he has gone to."

She was a little offended at this doubt of her influence over Steve, and she answered sharply, "If I had insisted on knowing my husband would have told me. But I am quite aware that his chief desire is to get free of every human claim. My husband is not like other men, his nature is too large to respond all the time to mere humanity. He wants the companionship of the sea and the woods. I see you do not understand."

"Do you?"

"Not always. I only feel that Stephen Lloyd is somehow far better than I am."

"There is no one better, or cleverer, or lovelier than yourself in the wide world, and the man is a fool that cannot see that."

He said these words with the force and intent of a man with an object before him, and Jessie knew well what it was. She did not say a word in answer, but with eyes downcast sat still as death for a moment or two. Then she rose and with an air of offence went to a party of ladies at the other end of the room.

But she had listened. The words, veiled as they were, had sunk into her heart, and Belton smiled as he watched her departure. "I shall get the word 'divorce' out some day soon," he thought. "And by my soul, that woman ought to have a husband that knows how to value her—myself for example—a scamp like Steve Lloyd ought to be easily got rid of—I wonder if she loves him. Some one told me she was a poor girl—married him for money likely—if so will unmarried for more money." And he strolled into the moonlit grounds, lit a cigar and thought it all over and out.

Jessie, in her way, acted very much like him. She chatted a few minutes with her acquaintances, complained of feeling sad and weary, and declared the whole day had been so trying she could not endure the noise and light of company any longer. She thought she had fully covered her retreat by these words, and could go to her room without exciting any feeling but one of admiration for her sympathetic heart. And yet these were the remarks that at a discreet distance followed her exit.

"Mr. Belton was at her side all evening."

"I saw him there."

"He has just gone into the grounds."

"She has gone to her room."

"Has there been a quarrel? Or—"

"She is much too prudent."

"Who knows? She is so vain."

"And so undeniably beautiful. I never saw her look so handsome."

For a moment or two Jessie had the same thought. She turned the lights fully on and looked steadily at herself ere she removed a single ornament. As she did so she recalled the almost angry admiration of Mr. Belton, and a crimson blush rushed over her fair neck and reddened the alluring pallor of her white cheeks and brow. "Why did I listen?" she asked herself. "I have given him no right to speak to me in such terms—I will certainly have no more to say to him—yet his admiration gives me eclat and I mean no wrong; I wouldn't wrong Steve by a single thought; Steve ought to be notified of his father's condition; I dare say Mr. Belton will understand the best way to trace him, and I may as well use the man. If I drop him altogether, women are so ill-natured they will be sure to suppose this and that and the other; and it is a fact that a man has come too near a good woman when he dares to say what she ought not to listen to. I cannot give a crowd of gossipers such an opportunity; no I can't do it for Steve's sake as well as my own. As for Paul Belton I rather think I can keep him in his proper place."

If a moth reasons about a candle flame it is probably in much the same manner; and if an original basis of clamorous selfishness be allowed, almost any disguise, even that of extreme virtue, will be assumed to compass its ends. Yet Jessie had been too well brought up not to know that she was on dangerous ground. Two things had happened that day which she could not misunderstand—Alice's refusal to accept her offer of assistance, and Mr. Belton's avowal of undisguised admiration. In her heart she felt the one to be as condemnatory as the other. She knew as well as Alice knew, that she was incapable of leaving the gay attractions of her hotel life for the gloomy surroundings of a house in which Death sat watching a dying man. And she knew, as well as Alice knew, that there must be something wrong in the conditions between Steve and herself, or he could not have so completely severed the tie between them, though it was only for a few weeks.

But the conviction of her faults brought no regret with it. If her conscience troubled her, she virtually said to it, "let my sins alone. I am not disposed to repent of them at present." She had no desire to change the gay piazza for the death room, no special wish even for Steve's presence at that time; since his return would mean her own return to the narrow bounds of the despised flat, which had once been so beautiful in her eyes. Alas! the very sweetest and truest of mortal love is insufficient to lift the earthly woman above earth. It needs the fire of Almighty God to warm the cold, selfish instincts of a worldly nature, into the glow of sacrifice and the ideal of love.

In the meantime, nothing could be more lonely and sorrowful than the Lloyd mansion on the avenue. The outside of a house has often as much expression as a human face, and there was a positive air of trouble about it. For humanity does impress itself on mere wood and stone, does impregnate the rooms of a house with its own spiritual emanations, and there are undoubtedly dwellings so tainted by the sins and sorrows which they have witnessed, that they are virtually haunted by presences created in them. Yea, there are rooms in houses which we should tremble to enter, if we knew the tragedies that still cling to their walls and frequent their void places.

In the large upper chambers of this splendid dwelling such a mortal tragedy

The New African Kola plant is Nature's botanic cure for Asthma in every form. Mr. A. C. Lewis, editor of the Farmer's Magazine, writes that it cured him when he could not lie down at night for fear of choking. Rev. J. L. If you are a sufferer, we advise you to send to the Kola Importing Co., 1164 Broadway, New York, who will send you a large case by mail free, to prove its power. was being lived out as could not be confined within its walls. Its mournful effluences drifted down the great stairways and filled the beautiful parlors and looked out of the half-closed windows, compelling the passer-by to a wondering, half-frightened glance, which he could not understand and so put quickly away. For here the rich Nicholas Lloyd had come to die. Here he sat waiting for the hour of fate. In his brain—that wondrous world with one inhabitant—he lived in profound and awful depths where things vague and fearful were half revealed and half hidden by mist of dreams. Led by old desires and ancient hates, tormented by the sins of vanished years, and pushed by hands that were dust long ago, into recesses dim and dark through treacherous sands and storms of flame, he suffered even in this life the awful penalty of the "outer darkness."

It was now that the long neglected wife came grandly up to the far back promise of her love. All that gives life its meaning and earnestness, and death its solemn and mysterious significance, moved her to super-human cares and faith. Her soul stretched itself out to a transcendent credence in the love of God. She dared to believe that all things, even the salvation of one so unconscious of his own danger, were possible to Omnipotence. And since he could not pray she prayed for him. Night and day ministering to his bodily necessities, she cried out incessantly "God be merciful to him." Faith crushed down every creed, but that grandly surpassing assurance that "He was not willing that any should perish." Then why should she limit this glorious zone of the divine

So whenever her husband would listen, the ineffable name was a help.

Heard it silently or tremblingly, looking at her with eyes so wide and pitiful that their gaze nearly broke her heart. It was possible that the thought of God could enter the brain, demented and hurried by the lust of gold? She knew that she believed that prayer was omnipotent.

There might be one sane, clean, honest, and granted in the which he could not be merciful to me a sinner."

And so surely he could not have been more faithful than Christ was holy. When he was fighting death and hell then, if his loving wife must pray for him, his apparent uselessness made her pray for him. She knew her husband must die. Medical science has felt that only too surely. When it says there is no hope, there is none. But the soul's salvation will not so pass. It spurns impossibilities; it returns to the unseen and the unknowable. In his valley of the shadow of death, his life also passed, and its gloom, suffering, and despair, were all the noticeable, because she left for it the sunshine of life's gayest verities, its sweetest hopes. No one willingly gives up its narrowest and darkest of roads; and Alice wept secretly as she inclined her head and whispered obedience to the circumstances, she could avoid nor control. She hoped her husband at least frequently step aside to comfort her loneliness, and bring her promise to her disappointment. But, first, it seemed, as if her hopes were realized. Within two days after her return to New York, Lord Medway visited the afflicted house. Alice was highly surprised; and Medway must have been the transfiguration of love and peace on her face when he entered her room unexpectedly. Adorably shy and self-conscious, she retreated behind her book as behind a barrier, but the young man was so specially tender and sympathetic, that she was easily led to go to the comfort he offered.

Next day he appeared to him more kindly desirable, yet he did not understand what delighted him that day in the invisible beauty, was the invisible—the evolution of accepted sorrow, the physical evolution, for the first time always the very portrait of the half-reluctantly at first, afterward that apparent desire and sincerity, and their immediate marriage. He did not to the business part of their union, as yet unfinished, he could trust to her; he could trust to him; and he decided to be altogether so unselfish and affectionate, that Alice gladly believed in him. At that hour she almost loved him. He won from her, by his faithful sorrow, far more than he had ever won in the sunny hours of so-called ease. Then, she had been coy and playful and please and chary of her lightest word at this dark hour, his fidelity spoken in her heart that overplus of womanly gratitude, which is so near akin to love. Medway was charmed by its delicious sweetness, and he went through the added hall and down the steps of the troubled house a very happy man.

"How sweet and good she is!" he whispered to himself as he drove through the city. "All her affections are like the roses, fair as the flowers themselves, sweet and gentle!" And then he smiled pleasantly at his own remembrance of the apt classical quotation. And that moment his heart was true to his promise; he had no intention of asking his renewed vow, he was fully determined to make Alice his wife with the least possible delay. And Alice had decided to consult her mother at once, the next morning name the day for their marriage.

"I will be here to-morrow at the noon hour," he said with a loving caress, and he held her hand for a moment and looked into her eyes, and felt sure that she had said "farewell" forever. For so pitifully kind is that prescience which accompanies the pure in heart, that even in his engagement in her ears, Alice could not but feel the gloom of its certain failure. Not that Lord Medway intended to fail—indeed, even Alice, with a severe justice, generated him so far—but weak men are easily cruel, through their selfishness, though they may not, as a rule, plan cruelty.

Medway, however, went directly from Alice to his lawyer's office, and he was frightened by the doubts and cautions he received there. This man had never favored his client's marriage with Nicholas Lloyd's daughter. He detested Lloyd, who had done him some wrong in the far back years of his early struggle for business, and throughout the whole negotiation he had quietly striven to delay and embarrass affairs. Indeed, his provoking contradictions and suspicions had been a large factor in developing the disease which had driven his old enemy to the chamber of death. He felt that this was the final struggle, and he put forth all his powers to such excellent purpose that he induced the young man to leave early the next morning for England. To the last moment he remained with him, and Medway, uncertain and perplexed, and completely under the influence of a man of tremendous resource and mental activity, went aboard the steamer unresolved, and miserably conscious that he was a consummate scoundrel.

"I will see the young lady," were the man's last words, as he held Medway's hand, "and make it all right. She is Nicholas Lloyd's daughter, and bound to be a sensible girl."

"I don't know, Mr. Rives; it seems to me all shamefully wrong, I declare it does. I think I will go on shore again."

"You must not. I will tell her you had a cablegram about important business. Take my advice and drop the whole affair. Have I any motive but your advantage? As far as I am concerned, it would be better for me that you should marry the girl."

"Then why do you fight against your advantage?"

"I have been young. I made a mistake myself. I won't see any fine young man get into a hole if I can help it. Lawyers are not altogether Sancho Panzas; there is something of Don Quixote in most of us. It is the last moment. Good-bye."

"But Mr. Rives—"

"Good-bye! I will see Miss Lloyd before noon. Write to her at your leisure." He said these words on the loosened gangway, and as the great ship began to move he called out, "Don't write at all. Let the matter drop entirely." Then as a parting shot: "I am ready to take up the Leavenworth affair as soon as you are."

Answer to this remark was impossible, but he noticed Medway laugh and lift his hat, and he said with a sigh of relief, "He is safe now." Then he put his hands in his pockets and walked thoughtfully to his coupe. It was too soon to call on Miss Lloyd, so he drove to the Hoffman House, ate a good breakfast, smoked a couple of cigars, and then resolved to get the business off his hands—as far as the young lady was concerned. He was fully conscious of the revengeful part he had played, and it was with a sense of well-deserved triumph he entered the house which he told himself he had "helped considerably to pull down."

Ten Yards of Dress Goods and Pattern to Cut It By, Express Prepaid,
for $2.00

A large mill owner having manufactured an immense quantity of Silk Stripe Zephyrs, in preparation for this season's demand, found himself with a large stock of goods on hand than he could sell through the regular channels of trade.

I approached him with an offer for the entire lot a few days ago, and to my surprise he accepted it. It is therefore possible for me to offer a dress pattern of this elegant material, express paid, with a pattern and full directions for making, for the astonishingly low price of $2.

The patterns are those sold by several of the largest retail dry goods stores in the land. Your knowledge of patterns will show you that the standard patterns which are sold the country over would cost you for a suit any where from 50 cents to $1. It is therefore a very easy matter to see that at the price I offer the buyer is getting what would ordinarily cost $4 or $4.50 for $2.

This offer must be accepted within thirty days, as I must turn the entire lot of goods into cash before the 15th of May.

In order to facilitate your choice of patterns, I will be glad to send samples of goods and pictures of paper patterns for your inspection and selection for 10 cents in stamps. If you purchase from these samples, the 10 cents paid will be credited on the purchase, and you need send but $1.90 in ordering.

Home Talks with Mothers and Daughters.

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

The Case of Charity Folsom.

CHARITY FOLSOM was a person who had few friends. Nobody could quite explain why, for Charity was young, handsome and well educated: she belonged to a good family, and was accustomed to polite society. All the same she was unpopular, and the people who did not say anything against her, were almost as pronounced in their dislike as those who did, for their silence was, in itself, significant.

I had not been long in the town where Charity lived, before I discovered the young woman's peculiar position, and one day I made it my business to ask my hostess, a motherly Quaker lady, what was the secret of universal indifference to the charms of a girl who ought to have been attractive.

"Thee must ascertain for thyself, dear," said Aunt Jean, and not another word would she utter.

But Miss Sharp-eyes, the tailoress, was less reticent.

"Charity Folsom is concentrated lemonade without any sugar," she declared. "She's as sour and hateful and horrid as possible, and is the most selfish young person in town. Of course nobody can endure such a character."

Concentrated lemonade without any sugar! It did not sound winning, but I made one more effort.

"Has any one tried to improve Miss Folsom? Or, has everybody taken her badness for granted?"

Miss Sharp-eyes hesitated. Quiet, Aunt Jeanie spoke.

"There is the trouble. Thee will soon observe it if thee goes about this place. Charity is let alone, and now she expects nothing better, and she lives up to her unhappy reputation."

To make a long story short, the plan was tried of looking for honey and sunshine from Charity Folsom instead of being satisfied to receive only vinegar and gloom. Pleasant speeches were made to her, she was asked to take agreeable duties on herself. When the church gave a sociable, Charity was invited to be a member of the reception committee, instead of as usual, being assigned to the supper room and the dish washing. A party was made up for an excursion, and Charity was included in the list who were considered desirable. Bit by bit, little by little, the social attitude toward her was changed, and her attitude changed in return. Being treated with amiability, she grew amiable. Being admired she became worthy of admiration. At the end of six months she was no longer disagreeable Charity Folsom, disliked and shunned, but the interesting Miss Charity, whose wit had a spice of pleasantry, and whose willing and efficient aid helped every movement on.

I have sometimes thought that in the household, we mothers are very apt to make a Charity Folsom of a trying child, taking for granted his moods and his temper, and discouraging him by lack of appreciation when he really tries to do better.

"Walter is so stupid!" I heard a mother remark one day. "Not in the least like Richard, who learns with ease and does us so much credit. I tell his father, we must be contented if Walter can graduate at the foot of the class."

Poor Walter heard this! Was it any wonder that his next report was marked by repeated failures and demerits?

"Susan is shy and self-conscious, so I keep her in the back round, and let Sophy represent the family," another lady complacently said, her criticism tending to add to Susan's awkwardness and to inflame the pretty Sophy.

I hold that few things are worse in character-building than dwelling on the defects of a person, and that no mistakes are worse in far-reaching effects for ill, than those made by parents who expect little from their young people, and let the latter find it out. To discuss children at all in the presence of others, is to say the least, injurious, but it is doubly so when their faults and errors are made the theme of talk. A boy has been irretrievably injured before now in the estimation of the community, by the thoughtlessness of his mother in relating his juvenile misdeeds, and a girl can grow up with a reputation for ill-temper and ingratitude, simply through the unfortunate comments of her home people on certain phases of her youthful life.

Charity Folsoms are to be found everywhere. They are to be pitied rather than blamed. Whenever we find them, let us instead of casting another slur, set ourselves to the task of brightening their lives so that they may brighten the lives of others.

Always in our home management, let us hold our children to the best by looking only for what is good. Many a child has been made untruthful, by the fact that his mother did not believe his word. The child to whom truth is invariably spoken, who hears only truth, and whose statements are accepted as trustworthy will seldom turn out to be a liar. Even the selfish and unforgiving child will thaw and become tender and generous, if love be uniformly brought to bear upon him, as the days are going by.

Little words of kindness,
Little deeds of love,
Make our earth an Eden,
Like the heaven above.

And,

Little things on little wings,
Bear little souls to heaven.

MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

LOVE'S MINISTRY.

THIS beautiful world has much of care
And sorrow and pain and strife,
And burdens indeed would be hard to bear
If love did not sweeten life.
The tenderest joy we shall ever know
On earth or in heaven above
Is the fairest light that will ever glow,
And its beautiful name is love.

O what should we do in the time of joy?
And what in the time of tears,
If tenderest hearts did not beat with ours,
Nor sympathy bless our years?
And what should we do in our failing powers
If love were not true and fond
To brighten the wearisome days and hours
Till we come to the gates beyond?

O love is the beautiful light of home,
Whatever of grief betides
And heaven is there with its shining dome
In the heart where love abides.
Oh! love is the meaning of God himself
And love is the magic key
To open the door of the hardest heart,
The glory of God to see.

God pity the lives that are dark and lone,
Where the love-light does not fall,
And send to them some who shall make Him known,
That his love may bless them all.
The tenderest joy we shall ever know
On earth or in heaven above,
Is the fairest light that will ever glow—
And its beautiful name is love.

Free to all Readers.—The New Cure for Kidney and Bladder Diseases, Rheumatism, etc.

As stated in the last issue the new botanical discovery, Alkavis, is proving a wonderful curative in all diseases caused by Uric acid in the blood, or disordered action of the kidneys and urinary organs. The New York Herald publishes the remarkable case of Rev. A. C. Darling, minister of the gospel at North Constantia, New York, cured by Alkavis, when, as he says himself, he had lost faith in man and medicine, and was preparing himself for certain death. Similar testimony to this wonderful new remedy comes from others, including many ladies suffering from disorders peculiar to womanhood. The Church Kidney Cure Co., of No. 418 Fourth Avenue, New York, who so far are its only reporters, are so anxious to prove its value that for the sake of introduction they will send a free treatment of Alkavis prepared by mail to every reader of The Christian Herald who is a sufferer from any form of kidney or bladder disorder, Bright's Disease, Rheumatism, Dropsy, gravel, Pain in Back, Female complaints, or other affliction due to improper action of the kidneys or urinary organs. We advise all sufferers to send their names and address to the company, and receive the Alkavis free. To prove its wonderful curative powers, it is sent to you entirely free.

The Bible in Mexico.

In a description just received from Guadalajara, Mexico, of the efforts being made to get the Bible into the hands of the people of that land, are the following notes of a tour taken by Mr. B. B. Blackly and Don C. Orocio, two colporteurs in the employ of the American Bible Society:

"The first day we traveled seven leagues, then stopped at a ranch called La Venta, where we sold two Bibles and a Testament. At another ranch sold a Testament and two Gospels of John. Farther on, we reached a small town named Tala. We followed the new railroad for some distance. This new railroad extends to Ameca, and will probably be built to the coast.

The first day from Ameca, we crossed a high river on horses, with the water up to our knees. We had the books carried over on the heads of Indians. We stopped two nights in Guachinango, an old mining town, three hundred years old. Here we sold only one Testament. A priest took a Testament from Orocio and would not pay for it nor return it until the Mayor talked with him; then the priest told Orocio to leave town at once.

We began work at the next town. About the first person who looked at a Bible was a priest, who told the people not to buy it as it was a bad book. This excited the people; Bible and Protestants is the town talk; several men came to our room to inquire, and Orocio talked to them freely and plainly about the Bible.

In Mascota we slept one night in the soldiers' quarters for protection, also had a policeman go around with us, and stand by our door when we were in our room. When we left two soldiers escorted us for some distance out. Our next stopping place was San Sebastian, a mining camp in the heart of high mountains. It is very rough, living is high, and the people poor, but not so fanatical as in Mascota. We traveled in a circuitous route to get to the town, the road is so very crooked, rocky and steep, and in many places the water has washed out the road. We passed through a ravine just wide enough for a horse to pass, and the mountains on either side rose way above our heads. If two travelers met here they could not pass. We passed through a beautiful piece of country with trees covered with moss and others with curious leaves and fruit. We sold six Bibles in this camp.

At Los Reyes, Orocio sold a Bible to an old sick woman who said she had never seen such a good book, and if she lived she would read it.

On the road I met a Mexican and showed him a Bible which he liked, but he had no money, so I offered him the Bible for his sabre, and immediately the trade was made. This has been the hardest trip I have taken in all my work. To tell of all the trials and hardships, the pleasures and enjoyments, would be impossible."

Fell to the Floor.

HIS LEGS SUDDENLY CAME OUT.

Thomas P. Bigg, of Cleveland, Stricken as He was Preparing for a Visit to Friends.

From the Leader, Cleveland, Ohio.

Of the list of the many so-called incurable disorders none has proved to be more of an enigma to the most learned and accomplished physicians than locomotor ataxia, or as it is more commonly known, creeping paralysis. This dread disease has baffled their skill, and they have been forced to admit that they cannot successfully cope with it. All they have been able to do is to mitigate the accompanying pain and suffering; beyond this the science of medicine has been of little or no avail to the many unfortunates who have contracted the dreadful malady, which, many people, especially those who are thus afflicted, believe is a forerunner of the grim messenger of death.

Thomas P. Bigg, who lives at No. 1073 St. Clair Street, corner of Lawrence St., Cleveland, O., has been suffering from locomotor ataxia for nearly five years, and nothing but his wonderful vitality has prevented his dissolution long before this.

The malady is directly attributable to his exposure during army life. He enlisted in the Third Regiment Ohio Cavalry in Toledo, and served nineteen months in the volunteer service, and after the close of the rebellion eighteen months in the regular army. "At first," he said in narrating his experience, "my stomach went back on me, and for six weeks I was laid up in a hospital in Texas. Ever since that time that organ has caused me trouble, and about seven years ago the doctor told me I was suffering from acute indigestion. That was bad enough, but four years ago last July paralysis came on, and I have been using these crutches ever since. The paralysis was in my legs, and it came rather suddenly. I noticed at first that my knees were a little stiff, a sort of rheumatic pain, you know. This quickly developed into paralysis."

I tried all kinds of remedies, and I tried physicians, but I did not improve. All this time, though, I was holding my own—wasn't

"Since the timely and almost solitary contribution of note, in the English language, to the history of the 'Anabaptists,' by Dr. Henry S. Burrage, sixteen years ago, no work on the subject comparable in worth with Professor Newman's has appeared in English. Meanwhile the available material and discussions in foreign languages have very greatly increased. The text gives continuous evidence of the author's careful and conscientious use of the best and most recent sources of information."—Prof. BENJAMIN O. TRUE, D. D., in The Watchman.

Christian Work says: "We doubt if there ever was a period in this world's history when this book was more needed or more calculated to do good. The whole subject is handled in a clear and masterly manner. The arguments brought to bear, the logical deductions and conclusions, are strong and convincing. At a time when the Bible is being so violently and craftily assailed, even in the name of the cause sought to be destroyed, no book can be more heartily welcome than this one. It will open in the mind of every reader a new and powerful line of thought."

THE "WELCOME" ON THE MISSISSIPPI.

The Christian Herald's Relief Boat and its Work Among the Flood Sufferers—Perils of a Journey on the Swollen River—A Mission of Mercy.

LETTERS received from Mr. George A. Seaman, in charge of the relief work conducted by this journal on the Mississippi River, contain some very interesting accounts of the operations of the Welcome. In his first letter, which was briefly written on board the boat, he mentions many cares incident to the work, and gives some account of the flooded sections that had been visited. This week we are enabled to present several photographs illustrative of the work. The Welcome, which is the fastest tug on the Mississippi River, is of a sturdy-built, and with a power—just the sort of craft to force its undertaking, the weather has been favorable and there has been no loss or damage to the food cargo. The tug's skiff is often in requisition to carry food to places where the steamer itself cannot penetrate. In such cases, one of the crew would row Mr. Seaman and Rev. Mr. Rife, the American Sunday School Union Missionary, to the place where the sufferers were congregated, sometimes on the upper floor of a half-submerged dwelling, sometimes on a raft and again on a knoll or piece of rising ground that stood like an island amid the waste of waters. Whenever it was practicable to do so, and where a few persons were gathered, Mr. Rife spoke to them briefly before the food was distributed, telling them of the goodness of Him who had put it into the hearts of his children sugar, hominy, crackers, cheese and canned meats, and wherever there were women and children, condensed milk and some trifling delicacies which would be particularly grateful to people in their weak and famishing condition. In this way many places were visited and hundreds of families supplied with enough food to last for several days. In most cases the need of the sufferers was extremely urgent. Many had no food for days except a little meal—hardly enough to sustain life.

At many places skiffs would come out would come to the windows or the roofs of half-submerged houses or gather on rafts or on hillocks that had not been covered by the waters, and strain anxious eyes in the direction of the tug. Skiffs came out from Cow's Island, Tenn., for way during the present trip among debris and other obstacles, as it has often been necessary to do. In some places the Welcome with its deck-load of provisions has ploughed its way among tree tops, which stood above the surface of the waters like clumps of willows. Fortunately for the

to seek out and help those in peril and suffering. He also distributed Bibles among them wherever they were needed. Then when the wants of the sufferers had been ascertained, they were supplied with a liberal hand from the Welcome's varied cargo. Meal, bacon, potatoes, flour, coffee, in response to the Welcome's whistle. All along the Mississippi River one long blast is known as a "begging whistle," and is a signal to call out a small boat from shore. The Welcome's "begging whistle" was at once recognized everywhere it was blown as a signal that help was near. People provisions, and when the Welcome reached Scanlan's Landing her whistle brought out a queer-looking boat which proved to be a "dug-out." Its occupant rowed back happily with food enough for his family. A number of others were also supplied here

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

Mrs. E. A. Wadsworth, Nev. Is it consistent with the teaching of God's Holy Word to ask a blessing at the table, when every article has been purchased with the profit of whiskey?

No, it is not. The liquor traffic is an unholy and destructive one from top to bottom, and is moreover the cause of a great part of the world's misery and wickedness. To ask the Almighty to smile upon and bless the fruit of such a traffic, is either rank hypocrisy, or the act of one who misunderstands the whole purpose of man's existence.

As a result of the recent suggestion published in THE MAIL-BAG, readers of this journal have supplied thirty poor ministers of the West and South (Kansas, Nebraska, Colorado, South Dakota, Tennessee, Louisiana and Florida) with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year, having subscribed in their behalf. We have still some fifteen names of poor ministers on our list of applications, none of whom is able to subscribe. We will be glad to hear from any friends who desire to help these worthy laborers for Christ, all of whom would be pleased to receive THE CHRISTIAN HERALD weekly.

Reader, Vettesville, O. Would a boarding-house keeper who had pledged herself to give a tenth of her income to the Lord be expected to give a tenth of the gross sum paid by her boarders, or a tenth of the balance left after the grocery and other bills had been paid?

A tenth of the balance. That is her income. It is the difference between the cost and the selling price which is her own. We can imagine cases in localities where competition is severe, in which, if she paid a tenth of the gross receipts, she would not have enough left to pay her bills and provide for her own necessary clothing, etc.

J. C. S., Arkalon, Kans. 1. Is there any place on the globe where the day is said to begin so that a ship's crew traveling Westward has to go back a day when it reaches that line? 2. How does such a fact affect the Sabbath, which according to God's command was to be kept on the seventh day?

1. We published on March 3 a letter from the U. S. Department of Agriculture explaining that the change takes place on the 180th parallel of longitude. It runs from Pole to Pole through Polynesia, a little east of New Zealand. You can easily see that it must be so, as our time in New York is about five hours different from Greenwich time, and the difference increases the farther West you go.

2. The sanctity of the day is not a question of numbers. The Talmudical writers perceived this. They ordained that if in traveling, or in solitary separation from Jewish ordinances, a man lost count of the days of the week, he must work six days and rest the following day, observing that as the Sabbath, though it might not happen to be the Saturday. If he did that, he would not be breaking the Sabbath, though he might be working on that day. This shows that even in those days when the laws of Sabbath observance were very stringent, the law was satisfied with the consecration of a seventh portion of time, if there were reasons for the seventh day not being observed as the Sabbath. Our reason for observing the first day is to celebrate the resurrection of Christ.

Reader, Pittston, Pa. Does Matt. 24: 14 mean that before Christ comes every man will have the Gospel preached to him?

No, the Gospel is to be preached to every nation as a witness. That is all that is predicted. Even in Christian lands there are many people who do not go to hear it preached. But it is predicted and it will be a witness against them, because they have the opportunity of hearing it and neglect it.

J. S., Silver Lake, Kans. Is it right, from the Christian's point of view, for one who is justly divorced to marry again? If so, how do you explain Mark 10: 12 and 1 Cor. 7: 11?

Your phrase, "justly divorced," is rather ambiguous. We do not know whether you mean a person who has righteously secured a divorce from a guilty partner, or the person who has committed the crime, and has been justly divorced for doing so. The difference is important. We apprehend that the guilty partner would not trouble very much about the Christian standpoint in considering any new marriage. The innocent party is certainly entitled to marry again. The passage you quote from Mark, like the corresponding one in Luke, is incomplete. If you refer to Matthew's fuller report of our Lord's words, you will see that there is one cause which in his opinion justified divorce. Paul's remarks in 1 Cor. 7: 11, do not apply to this cause, but to separations on other grounds.

Harry, H. H., Green Island, N. Y. What was "The Children's Crusade"?

There were several "Children's Crusades," the principal being that which was begun in 1212. According to the tales—which are not authentic, however, in all particulars—the idea of a Children's Crusade originated with Bernard, who was the apostle of the second crusade, as Peter the Hermit had been of the first. He held that the failure of the Crusades was in consequence of the sinfulness of the pilgrims and that none but innocent hands could win back the Holy Sepulchre and Palestine from the heathen. Accordingly in 1212 the experiment was tried with 30,000 children

Troy, O. I have just received a letter from the Misses Mason, at Huchow, China. They are constantly aided in their work by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. They have three daughters, all full of the Christ-spirit, and the youngest, now about twelve years of age, takes THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as she goes with her father through the city and surrounding towns, and shows the pictures to the heathen, explains them to the girls, and sings the beautiful hymns that are printed therein. The other girls (older) are also great workers, and are full of the missionary spirit. T. P. CHILDS.

Mrs. E. T., Kalamazoo, Mich. Do you consider the whole of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Sunday reading, or should some parts of it be read only on week-days?

We aim to make the whole paper worthy of being read in the family at any time. Naturally, those who read it on Sundays, will select the portions that are most helpful, spiritually.

C. B. S., Glennsone, N. C. What is meant by "the seed remaining in him" in 1 John 3: 9?

The apostle is speaking of the divine nature in Christian men. When it is imparted, it remains and grows and develops and permeates the whole nature. It is no party to sin but opposes it and if the man will yield to it, will keep him from committing sin as the apostle says.

L. S., Lime Springs, Ia. I have been distressed by the remarks made by Christ in Luke 21: 23, and 23: 29 as to the woes to women who are nursing infants. Do they imply that they are liable to punishment?

Conscience, Cheyenne, Wyo. Is a person who believes the Bible to be inspired from top to bottom and justified in supporting a man who preaches the doctrines of Higher Criticism?

If he preaches Christ as the Savior, and if you are justified in helping to him. Probably he does not devote attention to the Higher Criticism. If he is sadly wasting his time. The beliefs of the Higher Criticism will keep him from preaching Christ and his business as a preacher. If he believes the Old Testament in one way and you in another, you may still get good in preaching if you both love the Lord. intent on doing his work on earth must remember that persons who are counted orthodox and are looked upon as fashioned in their orthodoxy, general beliefs which our grandfathers would account heterodox. E. W., Hazleton, Pa. Was Paul converted by Damascus or after Ananias had seen him?

Probably the full assurance of his acceptance did not come until after Ananias had seen him, but the change of heart and effected by the appearance of Christ to the way. He learned then the wrong doing and repented. He appears to have spent the interval between time and the coming of Christ in prayer and thought and had given himself to Christ's service before Ananias.

G. R., Fairfield, Ia. 1. Was Sunday substituted for as a day of worship? 2. Does Paul say the right way to put on immortality at the resurrection if men are immortal?

1. We have no means of knowing the exact date. The title converts probably have observed Saturday as a observance of Sunday as of worship can be traced very early times. Tertullian flourished about 185 A. D. to the observance as if a regular thing, and speaks of having received it from the west before. The reference to the Acts to the meetings of the Apostles at Jerusalem they celebrated resurrection on the first day of the week. 2. I cannot see man is that is, will die. Those alive at Christ's coming, explains (1 Cor. 15: 51) have to undergo a change they become immortal and the new life.

ONE OF KING THEEBAW'S PALACES AT MANDALAY, BURMAH.

This remarkable building—an example of a most delicate and beautiful style of Oriental architecture, peculiar to Burmah, was once used as a Buddhist school by King Theebaw, whose notorious reign came to a sudden end several years ago. It is now an Episcopal church, and the Gospel of Christ is taught where heathen doctrines were formerly disseminated.

Anni, M. S., Cobden, Ills. How old is the Peacock throne, in Teheran, Persia? Is there any other throne equal to it in magnificence?

The "Peacock Throne" was originally brought from Delhi by Nadir Shah and was once valued at $30,000,000. It was the throne of the Mogul emperors of India, and in the days of Shah Jehan, occupied the Durani-Khas, or "Hall of Private Audiences." It was the work of a French artificer, Austin, of Bordeaux, who was a refugee in the Mogul court. When the Persians sacked Delhi in 1739, the throne was plundered of its jewels and taken to Teheran. It is still believed to be now worth $12,000,000.

A. B. P., Springfield, Mo. Is the quotation "Cleanliness is next to godliness," from the Bible? If not from what is it taken and who is the author?

It is from the Berachta (a Hindoo religious book) in the last Mishna of Sola. It is not in the Bible.

Reader, Springfield, I. I. What is the origin of the phrase "in less than no time"? Is there any sense or reason in such an expression as when one says he can go to a considerable distance "in less than no time"?

The saying has its origin in a demonstration of the difference between mean time and apturbed by these passages; but there is no ground for apprehension. In both instances Christ was speaking of the trouble that was to come on the nation in a few years. There was to be a hasty flight to the mountains and such persons would suffer much; but those who stayed behind to go through the horrors of the siege suffered still more. The description Josephus gives of the misery is appalling.

Subscriber. 1. Is it wrong for a Christian to play any game in which dice are thrown? 2. Is it wrong for a Christian to dance? 3. How do you explain Eccl. 3: 4, "There is a time to dance"?

1. Dice are now universally used as implements of gambling and should therefore be avoided. 2. It is a hindrance to spiritual growth and has ruined thousands. 3. Dancing or leaping for joy was referred to, and not the studied dissipation of the modern dance as it is now practiced.

M. A. S., Tennessee. A friend of mine and myself are much discouraged by the statements in Hebrews (6: 19). We fear from what is said there about persons who have been enlightened and have fallen away that there is no hope for us.

Do not entertain such fears. There is always hope for those who repent and seek pardon, pleading the merits of Christ. The warning in Hebrews was necessary because so many people at that time, as they do now, want to live in sin, and yet to go to heaven when they die. The writer of the epistle numbered and Repulsed by the Turks in Thessaly, the Little Kingdom still has Hopes—Powers may Intervene.

AFTER a week of heavy fighting on the frontier, the war between Turkey and Greece is no nearer a settlement than when it opened. King George's armies, after a most heroic defence, compelled, by the sheer force of the war, to fall back before the Turkish army. Edhem Pasha ranged his armies in a new shape, and it was only by a narrow margin that the Greek army, under Crown Prince Constantine, escaped annihilation on all sides. Mati, Rentina, Turnova, Damasi and all mountain passes were yielded to the enemy in the most desperate fighting, in which both sides sustained heavy losses. As Larissa was also threatened, the exhausted Greeks were greatly harassed at every point, that town was evacuated, and an orderly retreat to Pharsales, twenty miles to the west, was effected.

It is stated, the events of the week. The Greek armies in the West, and especially in Epirus, at were successful in every engagement. Even now threatening Janina, the headquarters. In Thessaly they successfully withstood the Turks at Viglia and Damasi, but they lost armies making rapid conquest in the west and with the tunnels and bridges of the Salonica railroad cut and destroyed, interfering with the forwarding of reinforcements; and also with the havoc the Greek fleet has committed in the Gulf of Salonica, destroying army stores and ammunition in vast quantities at Platamona and Katarina. Edhem Pasha was believed to be acting prudently in delaying further progress in the direction of Larissa, which he had declared he would capture in three days. Such promises often fall short in the performance, and as Larissa was said to be one of the most strongly fortified places in Greece, its earthworks and guns being so disposed as to make it possible for a force of resolute men to defend it, it was generally believed to be safe from capture.

With the capitulation of Larissa without a blow, the confidence of the Greeks in the ultimate success of their arms has been greatly shaken. Athens dispatches represent the retreat from Larissa to Pharsales as a precautionary step, since the former was situated on an open plain and incapable of being successfully defended against the Turkish cavalry and artillery, while Pharsales affords natural advantages that will enable the Greeks to make a stand there against a vastly superior force.

It is evident that the crisis of the war is rapidly approaching. Should either Greece or Turkey express a desire for intervention, the Powers are understood to be ready to interpose in the interest of peace, and to prevent unnecessary bloodshed. A turn of the kaleidoscope, however, might change the aspect of affairs in a single day. Should the Greeks make further headway in the West, and should their fleet venture to force the Dardanelles, the whole situation might assume such a shape that Athens would again be encouraged to hope; but at the present time the outlook is the reverse of hopeful for the brave but outnumbered and out-generalled armies of the Hellenic Kingdom.

Turkey may have other foes to contend against before the war closes. Bulgaria and the Balkan States are uneasy, and threaten to rise, but this is not now probable, unless the Greeks score some signal victory. Osman Pasha, "the hero of Plevna" in the last Turco-Russian war, goes to the front to take supreme command of the Turkish armies, and it is said that the Sultan, roused to action by the stirring events in the field, has declared that if King George of Greece carries out his purpose of taking the field in person, zees. Their fleet had laid Prevesa in the Gulf of Arta and forced the Turks far inland. King George's ships in the Gulf of Salonica, in the East, had destroyed quantities of Turkish ammunition and supplies, and the fleet is still operating in the Gulf of Salonica.

In the official Turkish dispatches, Gritza and Turnovo were reported as having been captured by Edhem Pasha, but recent information revealed the fact that the Greeks rallied after their first repulse and drove back the enemy with slaughter at both places. Later advices from Greek sources represented the Turks having been forced back upon Mouna Pass which they won a week after a desperate fight, and the loss of which was then thought to be an irretrievable blow to the Greek cause. Although the Ottoman battalions still held the Miliana Pass, they were apparently unable to advance farther into Thessaly until they were strongly reinforced. It was difficult to get the actual situation of affairs in Thessaly, since the dispatches from the two sides were in conflict; but the impression is general that the Turks had sustained serious reverses, details of which cannot be learned. Edhem Pasha's retreat to Constantinople—in which he declared that the destruction of the bridges over the river Peneios prevented his advance—has needed 40,000 more troops—has led between the lines to mean that he had temporarily abandoned the aggressive and decided to take steps to keep open lines of communication with Ellassona, his base of supplies. With the Greek he will leave Constantinople and place himself at the head of the Ottoman armies.

One of the remarkable features of the present war is the unopposed activity of the Greek fleet, while the warships of Abdul Hamid lie idle in the Bosphorus. It is true, the Sultan ordered his ships to sea, but their commanding officers one and all declared that they were unfit for service, and the chief of the Navy threatened to resign if they were placed in commission; consequently the order was rescinded, and the Turkish warships steamed slowly back to their moorings, one by one, so as not to attract attention in Constantinople.

Independent Mission in Ceylon.

FOR several years past, Mr. S. C. K. Rutnam, an educated native Hindoo, and a member of a famous missionary family in India, has been in this country finishing his studies, with a view to entering the missionary field in his own land. He has spoken with great acceptance before many American and Canadian audiences. He is a high-caste Christian Hindoo, and while still a mere lad began his education in Madras, India, and entered the University in that city, from which he was graduated with high honors. For several years he was engaged by the London Missionary Society as head-master of the mission high school of Belgaum, India, where he was also engaged as honorary secretary of the Y. M. C. A. work, then in its infancy in that country. Three years ago he was called to England to lecture in the interests of the Anti-Opium League, and since coming to the United States he has pursued a theological course in Princeton Seminary, and has received the degree of A. M. from that university. He will shortly return to his native land, where he purposes establishing a mission in north central Ceylon, in the district of Anuradapura. This district has a population of about 300,000, and offers a special field for missionary work, as there is not at the present time a single Christian missionary there. Mr. Rutnam will establish a mission high school, and make Anuradapura a centre of Christian activity. He estimates that $12,000 will be required to purchase the ground, erect the necessary buildings, and equip them for a period of five years, after which the school will be self-sustaining. He will conduct his work on strictly undenominational lines, and it will be maintained by voluntary subscription. A number of prominent American pastors and laymen have consented to act as a general committee for this deserving work, and they cordially commend the project and the founder to the support of Christian people everywhere. The committee is as follows:

Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman, D. D., Pennsylvania; Rev. Charles H. Parkhurst, D. D., New York; Hon. John Wanamaker, Miss Francis E. Willard; Rev. H. L. Hastings, D. D.; Hon. James A. Mount, Governor of Indiana; Rev. Wm. Patterson, D. D., Toronto, Canada; Rev. Wm. Brenton Greene, D. D., Princeton Theological Seminary; Rev. John Neil, Toronto, Canada; Rev. George I. Purves, Princeton Theological Seminary; Rev. George Osmon Ferguson, Washington, D. C.; Rev. Gerhardus Voss, D. D., Princeton Theological Seminary.

Mr. Rutnam may be addressed at Princeton, N. J., by any reader desirous of learning more of the work he is about to undertake in his native land.

A Good Name.

It is important to remember that there is a vast difference between character and reputation. The way to have a good name is to deserve it. There is no man so contemptible as the man who is striving to have the public esteem him for that which he is not. We have more scorn for the libertine who has enjoyed a reputation for piety, than for the man who has been openly immoral. When, therefore, we accept the wise king's estimate of the value of a good name, we must do it with the qualification, which he approved, that we deserve the good name. It is worthy of recollection, too, that good names come by service. Highly as riches are esteemed a good name never comes by them. Who would not rather be descended from Washington, or Jefferson, or Lincoln, or Peabody, or John Knox, or Luther, and bear their name than from some millionaire who hugged his gold to the last? The world honors those who render service to it not those who are selfish and greedy.

Giving to the Lord.

When Paul in his epistle to Philemon undertook to pay his correspondent anything that might be due to him from Onesimus, he reminded Philemon that he owed Paul even his own self. We do not know the result of this reminder, but we hope it led Philemon to cancel any claim he might have on Paul. We expect a man to show decent gratitude for services rendered to him. When, therefore, the subject of giving to the Lord is considered, the question is pertinent: "How much owest thou unto my Lord?" Truly if we take into account our obligations to Christ and let them be the measure of our giving, there would be no limit to our benefactions, but our resources. Christ expects us to hold our possessions lightly, not to set our hearts upon them. He wanted us to set our desires on better things, to be so intent on being God-like, that it should be of small concern to us whether we were rich or poor. The mere fact that a man had wealth, was not to him a matter of importance; but if he loved his wealth, that was a very serious and fatal matter. Such a man, in his opinion, ought to give it all away, as it was a snare to him. Thus it is that there is no New Testament law as to giving. It is expected that if there is a need of money either to relieve the need of others, or to propagate the Gospel, and we have money, that we shall give it. Much is said in these days of the consecration of the tenth, but there is no authority for the limiting the offering to the tenth. We ought to regard that as the minimum, because the Jews gave that proportion and they had not the obligations on them, which are upon us.

HUNGER IN INDIA.

A Sermon by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., This is Ahasuerus which reigned on the Text, Esther 1:1. from India even unto Ethiopia.

AMONG the 773,693 words which make up the Bible only once occurs the word "India." In this part of the Scriptures, which the Rabbis call "Megillah Esther," or the volume of Esther, a book sometimes complained against because the word "God" is not even once mentioned in it, although one rightly disposed can see God in it from the first chapter to the last, we have it set forth that Xerxes, or Ahasuerus, who invaded Greece with two million men, but returned in a poor fisher's boat, had a vast dominion, among other regions, India. In my text India takes its place in Bible geography, and the interest in that land has continued to increase until, with more and more enthusiasm, all around the world Bishop Heber's hymn about "India's coral strand" is being sung. Never will I forget the thrill of anticipation that went through my body and mind and soul when, after two weeks' tossing on the seas around Ceylon and India,—for the winds did not, according to the old hymn, "blow soft o'er Ceylon's isle,"—our ship sailed up one of the mouths of the Ganges, past James and Mary Island, so named because a royal ship of that name was wrecked there, and I stepped ashore at Calcutta, amid the shrines and temples and sculptures of that "City of Palaces," the strange physiognomies of the living and the cremations of the dead. I had never expected to be there because the sea and I long ago had a serious falling out; but the facilities of travel are so increasing that you or your children will probably visit that land of boundless fascination. Its configuration is such as no one but God could have architected, and it seems as if a man who had no religion, going there, would be obliged to acknowledge a God as did the cowboy in Colorado. His companion, an atheist, had about persuaded the cowboy that there was no God; but coming amidst some of that tremendous scenery of high rocks and awful chasms, and depths dug under depths, and mountains piled on mountains, the cowboy said to his atheistic companion, "Jack, if there is no God now, I guess from the looks of things around here there must have been a God some time." No one but the Omniscient could have planned India, and no one but the Omnipotent could have built it. It is a great triangle, its base the Himalayas, a word meaning "the dwelling place of snows," those mountains pointing out of their crystal cup the Indus, the Brahmaputra, and the Ganges, to slake the thirst of the vast populations of India. That country is the home of two hundred and forty million souls. Whatever he tastes, going there, his taste is satisfied. Some go as hunters of great game, and there is no end to their entertainment. Mountain, feline: Bison, buffalo, rhinoceros, elephant, panther, lion, tiger,—that is to be the perpetual game for Americans and Europeans, because he comes from the terrible swamps where no human foot descends, the deer and antelope as a common food, but once having obtained the taste of human blood, he wants nothing else and is called "the man-eater." You cannot see the tiger's natural ferocity after he has been humiliated by a voyage across the sea. You need to fear his growl as he paces his lion paw against the cage in Calcutta. Three or four have been abandoned in confinement because of the work of this cruel invader. In India in the year 1877, eight hundred and nineteen people were slain by the tiger and ten thousand cattle destroyed. From the back of the elephant or from galleries built among the trees fifteen hundred tigers went down and eighteen thousand dollars of government reward were paid the sportsmen. I advise all those who in America and other lands find amusement in shooting singing birds, coming home at night with empty powder-flask and a whole choir of heaven slung over their shoulder, to absent themselves for a while and attack the justifiable game of India. Or if you go as botanists, oh, what opulence of flora! With no distinct flora of its own, it is the chorus of all the flora of Persia, and Siberia, and China, and Arabia, and Egypt.

The Baptist missionary, Carey, who did infinite good to India, had two great passions—first, a passion for souls, and next, a passion for flowers, and he adorned his Asiatic home and the American homes of his friends, and museums on either side the sea, with the results of his floral expeditions in India. To prepare himself for morning prayers, he was accustomed to walk amid the flowers and trees. It is the heaven of the magnolia and abelmosk and palm tree. The ethnologist, going there, will find endless entertainment in the study of the races now living there and the races of whose blood they are a commingling. The historian, going there, will find his theory of Warren Hastings' government in India the reverse from that which Edmund Burke gave him in the most famous address ever made in a courtroom, its two characteristics matchless eloquence and one-sidedness of statement. The archaeologist will be thrown into a frenzy of delight as he visits Delhi of India and digs down and finds seven dead cities underneath the now-living city. All success to the hunters and the botanists and the ethnologists and the historians and the archaeologists who visit India, each one on his or her errand! But we to-day visit India as Christian women and men to hear the full meaning of a groan of hunger that has traveled fourteen thousand miles, yet gets louder and more agonizing as the days go by. But why have any interest in people so far away that it is evening there when it is morning here, their complexion darker, their language to us a jargon, their attire unlike that found in any American wardrobe, their memory and their ambition unlike anything that we recall or hope for? With more emphasis than you put into the interrogatory "Why," I answer, First: Because our Christ was an Asiatic. Egypt gave to us its monuments, Rome gave to us its law, Germany gave to us its philosophy, but Asia gave to us its Christ. His mother an Asiatic; the mountains that looked down upon him, Asiatic; the lakes on whose pebbly banks he rested and on whose chopped waves he walked, Asiatic; the apostles whom he first commissioned, Asiatic; the audiences he whelmed with his illustrations drawn from blooming lilies and salt crystals, and great rain-falls, and howling tempests, and hypocrites long faces, and croaking ravens—all those audiences Asiatic. Christ during his earthly stay was never outside of Asia. When he had sixteen or eighteen years to spare from his active work, instead of spending that time in Europe, I think he goes farther toward the heart of Asia, namely, India. The Bible says nothing of Christ from twelve years of age until thirty, but there are records in India and traditions in India which represent a strange, wonderful, most excellent, and supernatural being as staying in India about that time. I think Christ was there much of the time between his twelfth and his thirtieth year, but however that may be, Christ was born in Asia, suffered in Asia, died in Asia, and ascended from Asia, and all that makes me turn my ear more attentively toward that continent as I hear its cry of distress.

Beside that, I remember that some of the most splendid achievements for the cause of that Asiatic Christ have been made in India. How the heart of every intelligent Christian beats with admiration at the mere mention of the name of Henry Martyn. Having read the life of our American David Brainerd, who gave his life to evangelizing our American savages, Henry Martyn goes forward to give his life for the salvation of India, dying from exhaustion of service at thirty-one years of age. Lord Macaulay, writing of him, says:

Here Martyn lies! In manhood's early bloom, The Christian hero found a Pagan tomb! Religion, sorrowing o'er her favorite son, Points to the glorious trophies which he won. Immortal trophies! Not with slaughter red, Nor stained with tears by friendless orphans shed; But trophies of the Cross. In that dear name, Through every scene of danger, toil, and shame, Onward he journeyed to that happy shore, Where danger, toil, and shame are known no more.

Is there in all history, secular or religious, a more wondrous character than William Carey, the converted shoemaker of England, daring all things for God in India, translating the Bible into many dialects, building chapels, and opening mission houses, and laying foundations for the redemption of the country, and although Sidney Smith, who sometimes laughed at things he ought not to have satirized, had in the learned Edinburgh Review scoffed at the idea of what he called "low-born, low-bred mechanics" like Carey attempting to convert the Brahmins, Carey stopped not until he had started influences that eternity, no more than time, shall have power to arrest, two hundred and thirteen thousand Bibles going forth from his printing presses at Serampore. His sublime humility showing itself in the epitaph he ordered for the old Gospel Hymn:

A wretched, poor, and helpless worm,
On thy kind arms I fall.

Need I tell you of Alphonse Lacroix, the Swiss missionary in India; or of William Butler, the glorious American Methodist missionary in India; or of the royal family of the Scudders, of the Reformed Church of America, my dear mother church to whom I give a kiss of love in passing; or of Dr. Alexander Duff, the Scotch missionary, whose visit to this country some of us will remember forever? When he stood in the old Broadway Tabernacle, New York, and pleaded for India until there was no other depth of religious emotion for him to stir and no loftier height of Christian eloquence for him to scale, and closed in a whirlwind of hallelujahs, I could easily believe that which was said of him, that while pleading the cause of India in one of the churches of Scotland he got so overwrought that he fell in the pulpit in a swoon and was carried into the vestry to be resuscitated, and when restored to his senses and preparation was being made to carry him out to some dwelling where he could be put to bed, he compelled his friends to take him back to the pulpit to complete his plea for the salvation of India, no sooner getting on his feet than he began where he left off, but with more gigantic power than before he faints. But just as noble as any I have mentioned are the men and women who are there now for Christ's sake and the redemption of that people. Far away from their native land, famine on one side and black plague on the other side, swamps breathing on them malaria, and jungles howling on them with wild beasts or hissing with cobras; the names of those missionaries of all denominations to be written so high on the roll of martyrs that no names of the last eighteen hundred years shall be written above them. You need to see them at their work in schools and churches and lazarettos to appreciate them. All honor upon them and their households, while I smite the lying lips of their slanderers!

Most interesting are the people of India. At Calcutta, I said to one of their leaders, who spoke English well:

"Have these idols which I see any power of themselves to help or destroy?"

He said: "No; they only represent God. There is but one God."

"When people die, where do they go to?"

"That depends upon what they have been doing; if they have been doing good, to heaven, and if they have been doing evil, to hell."

"But do you not believe in the migration of souls, and that after we go into birds or animals of some kind?"

"Yes; the last creature a man is in of while dying is the one into which he will go. If he is thinking of a bird, he will go into a bird; if he is thinking of a beast, he will go into a beast."

"I thought you said that at death a soul goes to heaven or hell?"

"He goes there by a gradual process, may take him years and years."

"Can any one become a Hindoo?"

"I become a Hindoo?"

"Yes, you could."

"How could I become a Hindoo?"

"By doing as the Hindoos do."

From the walls of one of their mud at Jeypore I had translated for me beautiful sentiments:

The wise make failure equal to success. Like threads of silver seen through beads, let love through good deeds show.

Do not to others that which if done would cause these pain. And this is the duty.

A man obtains a proper rule of action looking on his neighbors as himself.

From that continent of interesting, from that continent that gave the world from that continent which has been deared by so many missionaries, there comes a groan of eighty millions in hunger. More people are in of starving to death in India to-day the entire population of the United States.

In the famine in India in the year about six million people starved to death. That is more than all the people of New York, of Philadelphia, of Chicago, put together. But that was not a tenth part as awful as the there now raging. Twenty thousand dying there of famine every day.

villages and towns have died—every woman and child; none left to be dead. The vultures and the jackals, the only pall-bearers. Though some has been sent, before full relief can them I suppose there will be at least million dead. Starvation, even for person, is an awful process. No food vitals gnaw upon themselves, and mess and languor and pangs from hunger, and horror and despair and it take full possession. One hand wheat or corn or rice per day would life going, but they cannot get a bit.

The crops failed and the millions dying. Oh, it is hard to be hungry world where there is enough grain, fruit, and meat, to fill all the mouths on the planet; but alas! the sufferer and the supply cannot be brought together. There stands India, looking at her! Her face dusky from hot suns of many centuries; and her turban such aching of brow as a dying nation feels; her eyes hollow with unutterable woe; the tears rolling down her sunken cheek; her back bent with more agonies than she knows how to carry; her ovens containing nothing but ashes. Gaunt, ghastly, wasted, the death upon her forehead and in her such as the last hour brings, she stretches forth her trembling hand toward us with hoarse whisper she says: dying! Give me bread! That is what I want! Bread! Give it to me quick!

it to me now—bread! bread! America has heard the cry. Many millions of dollars have already been collected. One ship laden with bread has sailed from San Francisco for our Senate and House of Representatives in a bill signed by our sympathetic president, have authorized the Secretary of the Navy to charter a vessel to carry to the famine sufferers, and you may see that ship. We want to send at least hundred thousand bushels of corn, will save the lives of at least six hundred thousand people. Many will contribute of money, and the barn-corn-cribs of the entire United States pour forth their treasures of food. That ship is laden till it can carry no more we will ask Him who holds the world in his fist and plants his triumphant flag in stormy waves to let nothing but happen to the ship till it anchors in the Gal or Arabian waters. They who by contributions of money or bread toward filling that relief ship will give their own food for their lifetime with tizing qualities and insure their own fare through the promise of him who "Blessed is he that considereth the Lord and the Lord will deliver him in trouble."

what a relief ship that will be! It turn a screw nor hoist a sail until we had something to do with its Just seventeen years ago from a ship on similar errand from New York harbor—the old "Constellation." It had once guns of death; but there was famine, and the Constellation was with five hundred tons of food, once covered with smoke of gunpowder, then covered with Easter hosiery, that ship, constructed to battle the going forth over the waters to some of her starving subjects, a sword into ploughshare, better ear into pruning-hook was that frigate, turned into a white-winged resurrection, to roll away the mouth of Ireland's sepulchre like errand five years ago the ship put out with many tons of food struck Russia. One Saturday on the deck of that steamer as at Brooklyn wharf, a wondrous place. A committee of the daughters had decorated the ship with bunting, American flags intertwining. Having joy of seeing that ship thus consecrated had the additional joy of standing in the docks of St. Petersburg. The planks of the relief ship were put out and the representatives of the nobility and of royalty went aboard the long freight train at the same time down to take the food to the starving on alternate cars of that train and Russian flags floating. But hunger in India is mightier than Ireland or Russia ever suffered, ought to be the response, and on a scale that the one ship would be a whole flotilla—New York sending Boston another, Philadelphia another, New Orleans another, then all meet in some harbor of the world. What a peroration of mercy for the nineteenth century! I would like to see the wharf at Calcutta or Bombay when such a fleet come in. With what would be welcomed! The emaciated lift their head on the shriveled elbow, and with thin lips ask: "Something—something to eat?" And the villages and towns, too weak to crawl out on hands and knees for the first grain of corn they could find put it to their famished lips. Try out for you and for others to the sufferers. "Wait a little longer, bear a little more. O dying men of India! O emaciated women! O emaciated babes! O on the way, and more relief will be coming. We send it in the name of the Asiatic Christ, who said, 'I was hungry and ye fed me: inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these brethren, ye have done it unto me.'"

Indian people of America! I call attention to the fact that we may never before, by one magnificent open the widest door for the evangelization of Asia. A stupendous obstacle, the way of Christianizing Asia, on the difference of language, but people understand the Gospel of Christ. Another obstacle has been the caste, but in what better way can we teach them the brotherhood of man? A huge difficulty in the way of Christianizing Asia has been that those who thought the religion we would take was no better than their own or Mohammedanism, but they see by this crusade for the relief of fourteen thousand miles away that Christian religion is of a higher, grander type than any other for when did the followers of Christ or Vishnu or Buddha or Confucius or Mahomet ever demonstrate like this in people on opposite side of the globe? Having taken the bread of this world from our hands, they will be more apt to receive the bread of Eternal Life. Missionaries of different denominations, India at forty-six stations are distributing relief sent through the CHRISTIAN HERALD. Is it not at those missionaries, after feeding the hunger of the body will be at advantage to feed the hunger of the soul? When Christ, before preaching to the thousands in the wilderness, broke through the miraculous loaves, he indicated the best way to prepare the mind for spiritual and eternal considerations, first to look after their temporal needs. O. Church of God in America! Trope! This is your opportunity.

We have on occasions of Christian patriotism cried: "America for God!" Now let us add the battle shout: "Asia for God!" In this movement to give food to starving India I hear the rustling of the wing of the Apocalyptic Angel, ready to fly through the midst of heaven proclaiming to all the kingdoms and people and tongues the unsearchable riches of Jesus Christ.

And now I bethink myself of something I never thought of before. I had noticed that the circle is God's favorite figure, and upon that subject I addressed you some time ago, but it did not occur to me until now that the Gospel seems to be moving in a circle. It started in Asia, Bethlehem, an Asiatic village; Jordan, an Asiatic river; Calvary, an Asiatic mountain. Then this Gospel moved on to Europe; witness the chapels and churches and cathedrals and Christian universities of that continent. Then it crossed to America. It has prayed and preached and sung its way across our continent. It has crossed to Asia, taking the Sandwich Islands in its way, and now in all the great cities on the coast of China people are singing "Rock of Ages" and "There is a Fountain Filled with Blood." For you must know that not only have the Scriptures been translated into those Asiatic tongues, but also the evangelical hymns. The Gospel will move right on through Asia until the story of the Saviour's birth will anew be made known in Bethlehem, and the story of a Saviour's sacrifice be told anew on and around Mt. Calvary, and the story of a Saviour's Ascension be told anew on the shoulder of Mt. Olivet. And then do you not see the circle will be complete? The glorious circle, the circle of the earth!

May the 10th, 1869, was a memorable day, for then was laid the last tie that connected the two rail tracks which united the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. The Central Pacific Railroad was built from California eastward. The Union Pacific Railroad was built westward. They were within arm's reach of meeting, only one more piece of the rail track to put down. A great audience assembled, mid-continent, to see the last tie laid. The locomotives of the Eastern and Western trains stood panting on the tracks close by. The tie was made of polished laurel wood, bound with silver bands, and three spikes were used—a gold spike, presented by California; a silver spike, presented by Nevada, and an iron spike, presented by Arizona. When all heads uncovered and all hearts thrilling with emotion, the hammer struck the last spike into its place, the cannon boomed it amid the resounding mountain echoes and the telegraphic instruments clicked to all nations that the deed was done. My friends, if the laying of the last tie that bound the East and the West of one continent together was such a resounding occasion, what will it be when the last tie of the track of Gospel influences, reaching clear around the world, shall be laid amid the anthems of all nations? The spikes will be the golden and silver spikes fashioned out of the Christian generosity of the hemispheres. The last hammer-stroke that completes the work will be heard by all the raptured and piled-up galleries of the universe, and the mountains of earth will shout to the thrones of heaven. "Hallelujah! For the Lord God Omnipotent reigneth. Hallelujah! For the kingdoms of this world have become the kingdoms of our Lord Jesus Christ!"

The "Welcome" on the Mississippi

Above Fritz's Landing a house was discerned back among the trees, but there were no men there to take out a boat and the whistle sounded in vain. The tug's boat had to be loaded to take the food to the women and children who were imprisoned on a raft with two mules they had saved. Blue's Point.

Ark., had a large group of people, black and white, awaiting the tug.

The local relief committees in Memphis and Helena, which are composed of their foremost business men, have done nobly in their relief work, but the distress is so great and the flooded territory so vast that it is impossible for them to relieve but a proportion of the destitute.

The Welcome, with its skiff, is able to leave its provisions at many out-of-the-way the very poor remain. They have not the means to purchase food, and must rely on relief until it is possible for them to go to work again. This is the class THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Expedition is reaching.

At Austin's Landing, Ark., an invalid laboriously made his way to the Welcome's side in a "dug-out." He is living in a tent on the levee, with a family of three children and a sick wife. He was supplied with enough food and delicacies to last them ten days.

At Ferguson's Landing, Ark., Mr. Seaman took on board the Welcome a lame man who was painfully attempting to walk the levee to Laconia to reach medical aid for his sick wife, who was in a very precarious condition. At Laconia, the Welcome's skiff took him to the doctor's submerged office, from which he was dispatched home with medicines, provisions, and delicacies. This prompt action probably saved a life.

Every point at which the Welcome called the sufferers were the better for its brief visit of relief and consolation.

Not alone were the much-needed provisions acceptable to the body, but the spiritual sustenance and aid which was administered by the missionary of the Giver of all things was indeed gratefully received by the weary refugees who were thereby comforted and reminded of the greatness and goodness of God.

Mr. Rife spoke words of cheer and hope to the people, calling to their attention the beneficent care of Providence that had put into willing hands the means to give from their store to relieve those in distress and need. Many a heart was lighter for the arrival of these messengers of mercy, and many a one who had felt a doubt of the blessed truths of Christianity, was by the timely visit of the Welcome brought back to thoughts of him who with loving care watches over his children, even though they may stray far from his paths.

About eighty inhabitants of the deserted villages of Westover, Ark., have made temporary camps on the levee about half a mile up the river. A LIGHT IN A DARK PLACE.

How the Tenement House Chapter of the King's Daughters and Sons has Cheered and Brightened Lowly Lives on the Crowded East Side of New York City.

AMONG the crowded tenements of the East side of lower New York a quiet, unostentatious work of Christian ministration is being done, which is the greater part, self-respecting people who earn their money and pay their way. Occasionally a little help is lent or given to pay the rent in an emergency, or to pay sometimes terminated fatally, through the lack of timely attention. Too poor to pay for a hired nurse, a sick woman would struggle to wait on herself, or to resume her place in the household, and retard her recovery in the effort. The summer corps of doctors employed by the Board of Health knew of numberless cases of the kind and saw patients go down to the grave, or become chronic invalids, through the lack of the cheap delicacies and slight attentions which the wealthy receive in sickness. Mr. Riis suggested to the Central Council of King's Daughters, that of all the services the Order was rendering in the name of Christ, none was so urgently needed, or would be so fruitful of results, as to follow the summer corps of doctors in their visits and take under their charge such cases as the doctors might advise, giving nursing, sick-diet, and friendly assistance as might be needed in the sick-room. His suggestion was accepted, and a Chapter of the Order was organized for this special sphere of work. A room was hired at 91 Madison street, in the heart of the tenement district, as an office and headquarters, and a trained nurse was engaged to take charge of the cases. Her services were made to cover as large a field as possible, by her paying regular visits like the physician, rather than giving all her attention to some one case. That was the humble beginning of the extensive and many-sided beneficence now carried on by the Tenement House Chapter, which has outgrown its single-room quarters and has now found the whole basement of the house, to which it subsequently moved, too small for its work. It is this week moving to commight not understand, but they knew it was a better place and they cordially accepted the invitation to use it. The influence of the work and the workers felt more than was known at the time. One incident revealed it and at the time gave a name to the poor back which indicated the children's idea of illustrious associations. One of the children, who had recently been introduced to the privileges of the yard, in the moment of the play, used an expression common enough in the streets but which was unfit for ears polite. Immediately a reproof from the children furnished the place: "You must not use such words here: this is the King's garden." The words were overheard and they showed the workers of the Chapter how the influence of the place had impressed on the juvenile mind and had made very surroundings sacred. "The Garden" became the recognized name of the yard and day by day it has been with those of whom the King said such is the Kingdom of Heaven.

very little known, but is singularly beautiful and Christlike. There are abundant opportunities for such labor in that locality, for life is very dreary in those dull homes, the burdens are heavy, and there is often a struggle for bare existence, which seems to preclude any enjoyment or diversion. The lot of the toiler who must be early at his work and must give it his best thought, as well as the labor of his hands, through the weary hours of the day, and must pass the hours of rest in a home which shelters a larger number of families than ought to be cooped up under a single roof, is at best a dismal one and is apt to become sordid. When sickness or trouble in any of its thousand shapes comes upon the family, it presses heavily and the misery is intensified. At such times the need of some kindly, helping hand is very sore, but it is seldom extended. There is no lack of neighborly sympathy, but when each back is bearing a burden almost too heavy for its strength, the aid that one neighbor can give to another is very small. How beautiful then is it when some kindly, gentle friend with the love of God in her heart, comes into the afflicted home and with helpful word and deed, sheds sunshine in the gloom. There is no fame or glory to be won by such service; there is seldom public recognition of it; but it is seen with approval by the King, who will one day greet those who render it, with the words: "I was a-hungred and ye gave me meat; I was thirsty and ye gave me drink; I was a stranger and ye took me in; naked and ye clothed me; I was sick and ye visited me; I was in prison and ye came unto me. Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of these my brethren, ye did it unto me."

This is the business in which the Tenement House Chapter of the King's Daughters and Sons is engaged among the tenements of New York. It is to visit the sick and suffering, to give advice to the perplexed, to teach the ignorant concerning the work, to meet and cheer all kinds of human difficulties, the devoted ladies and the Christian men who are working with them in ministering to their poor neighbors. "In His Name." Their work is not a glory in the ordinary meaning of the term. The people around them are for funeral expenses, or to provide necessities when the bread-winner of a family is sick; but this is exceptional. The real service which the neighborhood has learned to appreciate, is the personal kindness and friendliness which is far more precious and far more rare than gifts of money. It is well that there are in all our great cities men who have only to be told that their brother is in need, and they will give freely to relieve his wants. In no previous generation has such liberal charity been manifested; and we thank God for the spirit that prompts their munificence; but more than this is needed, if we are to fulfill our whole duty. There are multitudes who shrink from begging or borrowing and to whom the very name of charity seems almost an insult; but they are nevertheless in need of help. They want some one to think for them, some one to take an interest in their trials and difficulties and to show them the way to a better life. These things the Tenement House Chapter is trying to do, and it is doing them without the condescension and patronage which sometimes offends the beneficiaries and occasionally widens the gulf between men of different classes. But there is no humiliation in receiving personal service and no one is pauperized by it.

The work originated in a suggestion to no lous premises in Henry street, where the whole of a large old-fashioned house will be occupied by the various departments of the Chapter's labor of love.

This beginning, made in the summer of 1890 demonstrated, not only the need there was for such work, but the many other opportunities there were of rendering valuable service to the people among whom the Chapter had come to work. Gifts of money and clothing were solicited from the circles of the Order, and workers were invited to give their services in extending the work. No sooner had the larger quarters at 77 Madison street been occupied, than a proposal came from another organization, at work in the district, to join forces, and immediately a whole circle of busy activities was added to the nucleus of the nursing and sick-room service of the Chapter. The back yard of the house became a playground for the children of the neighborhood, who were quick to appreciate the advantages it offered over the pavement and the gutter. The physical and moral dangers of the street, the only playground that had previously been at their disposal, they difficulties in seven years existence, to pay its salary, to pay the salary of a trained nurse, other necessities, expenses, has been a great deal; more work has been done than could be maintained, but the Chapter has held on its way every year of its benewidened. An effort to help the need of the district revealed the fact that a large proportion of them were ignorant of the simplest duties of cutting, making, and repairing their children's garments, the little graces about their poor which would go so far to make homelike. Mothers' clubs were organized and informal meetings held, at which was sewing and friendly conversation, suggesting improvements in the household which could be made without cost, and the session closing with a meal of tea and cake. A Lending Library was gradually collected, which has been very popular, and now comprises over thousand volumes. A Kindergarten was opened, which is now the pride of the Chapter and the joy of the little Mr. David Willard devoted his time and energy to the organizing of Boys' A Penny Provident Fund was started which was popular from the beginning. Several clubs for the younger girls, on the same pattern as the Mothers' Club, also been established, and in a variety of other ways the Chapter has set of plans which have received a hearty support from the people. Meanwhile the original design of the Chapter has been neglected. That, too, has been remedied by arrangements for sending convalescent mothers and children to the country for the beaches for fresh air. The Chapter has been singularly fortunate in the services it has secured. Miss Alice C. the Superintendent, has been loyal and given the work her unremitting aid. Her unflinching faith and undeviating cheerfulness have been an inspiration to the workers in all departments.

CORN FOR INDIA POURING IN.

The whole Country Bending its Energies to Fill the Ships—Local Committees in the Corn States Doing Splendid Work—Drs. Talmage and Klopsch in the West.

MAGNIFICENT progress has been made during the past week in the work of preparing the corn cargoes for famine-stricken India. Local Committees are now actively engaged in the corn states, and every mail brings to the CHRISTIAN HERALD letters announcing that loads of corn have already been loaded or are well under way.

The present moment, over one hundred car-loads of corn are loaded and on the track or in the process of loading, and twice as many more are in preparation. The corn being gathered in different localities throughout the country. A tremendous impetus has been given to the movement by the Western tour of Dr. Talmage and Dr. Klopsch, through the great corn-growing States. They were accompanied on this tour by Miss Mary Leitch, the famous American missionary to India, and several others prominent in the India relief work, and everywhere received with the heartiest enthusiasm by vast and sympathetic audiences.

Within a few days after they set out secured pledges of upwards of sixty thousand bushels of corn. This included gifts of contributors from Des Moines, Lincoln, Topeka, and several other Western cities, but is altogether independent of Chicago. The tour, as a whole, will result in the addition of a full hundred thousand bushels of corn to the largest store that will shortly be speeding relief to suffering India. Four Relief Committees are now assured, and the famine may even be larger. What a glorious outcome to America's benevolence!

Many of the auditors at those enthusiastic Western meetings came from long distances. Dr. Talmage's eloquent pleading for the hungry millions of India. The great preacher had left his Washington pulpit and cancelled all other engagements for three weeks, and gave his services gratuitously to the cause of India. He was greeted by immense audiences everywhere. At Springfield, Ill., two great meetings were held, one in the Senate Chamber, and the other in the Hall of Representatives. At Decatur, there was a magnificent outpouring of over 2,000 people crowding the Disciples' Tabernacle. Contributions at both places were liberal and many cars of corn were pledged. At Bloomington, Ill., a great gathering was held in the First M. E. Church at which ex-Vice President Stevenson presided. Owing to the unprecedented demand for seats, it was found necessary to issue tickets of admission to prevent overcrowding. The result of the meeting, which was most enthusiastic, was the addition of a handsome sum to the Famine Fund and pledges of a number of cars of corn. At Peoria, Ill., 200 persons were assembled in the Tabernacle to hear Dr. Talmage and the other speakers, and at Davenport, Ia., the Opera House was crowded with an enthusiastic audience and one equally large filled the Skating Rink in the evening. Many pledges were received at both places. At Rock Island, 3,500 gathered, and one of the grandest meetings ever known there was held. The contributions to the Fund for a single day from these meetings was over $1,500.

At Omaha the Opera House was crowded almost to suffocation, and the Dubuque, Ia., Opera House was also the scene of a most magnificent gathering. It is estimated that over 30,000 persons in the West have listened to Dr. Talmage's eloquent pleading for India, exclusive of the great audience at the Chicago Auditorium. Altogether, the trip has been a phenomenally successful one, although it has kept the workers busy so constantly as to allow them hardly even sufficient time for rest. There were many incidents of the trip worthy of recording did space permit.

Churches and communities vied with each other in the cordiality of their welcome and at nearly all points the audiences were overflowing with sympathy. Thousands of readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, who have been pleasantly identified as co-workers in its world-wide charities during recent years, greeted Drs. Talmage and Klopsch most heartily, and overwhelmed them, as well as Miss Leitch, with offers of hospitality, which, however, it was impossible to accept.

All the churches were found to be in thorough sympathy with the movement for India and eager to co-operate. The members of the Church of the Disciples (called Christians) were exceptionally prompt and liberal contributors. The Western tour concludes appropriately with the great Indian Famine demonstration at the Chicago Auditorium, May 3d, when Dr. Talmage addressed one of the largest audiences ever known in the West. His heroic labors for India have nowise exhausted him physically, although many men would have succumbed under such a strain.

Meanwhile rapid progress is being made in getting the contributed grain forward from all points to the seaboard. Not only will the ships generously furnished by Congress be loaded with corn, but if our people unite heartily in a general effort for the saving of India's dying millions, the ships tendered by England will likewise be freighted with cargoes of life-giving food, bringing joy and blessing to all concerned. Everyone who hears the cry of India should hasten to help and to have a share in this great life-saving work—which promises to be the climactic, international charity of the nineteenth century.

In the meantime, the gifts of money already cabled to India from the Fund contributed by our readers, are being used for the preservation of life. Grateful letters from the missionaries who have been enabled to feed the people around them by the liberality of the Christian people of America are still coming in. Rev. E. S. Hume, of Byculla, writes in a letter received just as we go to press:

I shall be glad to use the one thousand dollars in rescuing famine children, and when this sum has been exhausted, shall make bold to ask you for more. The sooner the help comes the better. We are in the midst of opportunities which must be seized without delay, or they will be forever lost. Please accept my hearty thanks for this very generous and timely help at a time of great need. We are suffering from two sore trials—famine and plague, either of which should call out the lively sympathy of the whole Christian world. The two coming together, as they have, are making the lot of the people almost unbearable.

Rev. R. Winsor, of Sirur in the Poona district, to whom one of our remittances was sent, expresses "the deepest gratitude" for the timely aid. He at once dispatched a native mission preacher to make a tour of the remote villages of the district where the suffering is most acute and relieve the people who through weakness, or sickness, were unable to reach the relief camps. Rev. C. B. Newton, of Julundur City, North India, another of our devoted volunteer missionaries, writes:

I was greatly rejoiced to learn of your generous aid, for there are many converts of the out-caste class in this station and the villages connected with it; and their condition is truly pitiable. I made an effort in December to help them having raised nearly $45 for the purpose, but the money soon ran out and the work stopped. Under these circumstances, I had reason to be both glad and thankful when your help came.

money in the name of Christ to feed her starving millions. It is an opportunity that it would have been criminal to neglect. It seemed as if God were saying to Christendom, "Behold I set before you an open door." Our readers are enabling the missionaries to enter it. In the spirit of Christ the words which he addressed to his disciples in the presence of the hungry multitude have been flashed to the missionaries across the seas: "Give ye them to eat," and the means to do it are being placed in their hands. After this experience, the message of the Bread of Life will command a more ready hearing than ever before, from the people who have received at the same hands "the bread that perishes."

The necessity for continued help increases day by day. The stories of the men who go into the famine districts show that the sufferers now include not only the people directly affected by the failure of the crops, but the next class of producers, the weavers and potters, whose products remain unsold on their hands because their usual customers need all their money for food. With grain at famine prices these small manufacturers are now unable to buy enough to keep themselves alive. Thus the area of distress has widened and has taken in people who seldom feel the pinch of extreme poverty. These people are swelling the numbers on the relief camps and their wives and children are in many cases perishing of want in their villages. In some instances where it has been possible to reach a camp, they too have been taken. A photograph of one of these camps taken expressly for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD appears on this page. A reporter of a Calcutta journal who visited it, writes: "It was a curious sight, and one

FAMINE RELIEF CAMP FOR WOMEN AND CHILDREN AT JHANSI.

All local Famine Fund Committees, or those connected with such Committees, or those who are willing to act on Committees or wishing to organize Committees, are earnestly requested to send their full names and addresses to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in order that full instructions, circulars and other printed material may be promptly forwarded.

Local Committees are now actively at work preparing shipments of corn at over one hundred different localities in Ohio, Iowa, Pennsylvania, Michigan, Wisconsin, Illinois, Kansas, Virginia, Vermont, New York, New Hampshire, South Dakota, Nebraska, and other states, and there are scores of letters in every mail containing inquiries, as to the method of organizing a local Committee for the purpose of gathering corn.

During the services at Carnegie Music Hall, New York, on April 25, Mr. Dwight L. Moody, the well-known evangelist, made a stirring appeal for India. He said:

One dollar will keep a person in India in food for three months. They are dying by the millions. I have come from the West, and I have seen enormous cribs of corn which have been standing there for years. It has been so cheap that they could not afford to sell it. We live in a land flowing with milk and honey. India is having a hard time; we are not. I think it is much easier for us to give than for them to starve. Bow all your heads and pray for the suffering millions in India.

stances, I had reason to be both glad and thankful when your help came.

Bishop J. M. Thoburn, who has superintendence of all the Methodist Missions in India, writes:

Our most experienced missionaries now anticipate that there will be no abatement of the suffering before the first of July and possibly not then. Everything will depend upon the regular rains. If these do not come at the usual season, the calamity which will be upon the country will be frightful indeed. Allow me to thank you very sincerely for your interest in the suffering millions of India.
